

THE FRAGMENTS
OF SOPHOCLES

IN THREE VOLUMES

VOLUME I

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS

C. F. CLAY, MANAGER

London: FETTER LANE, E.C.

Edinburgh: 100 PRINCES STREET

New York: G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS

Bombay, Calcutta and Madras: MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD.

Toronto: J. M. DENT AND SONS, LTD.

Tokyo: THE MARUZEN-KABUSHIKI-KAISHA

All rights reserved

THE FRAGMENTS
OF SOPHOCLES

EDITED

WITH ADDITIONAL NOTES FROM THE PAPERS OF SIR R. C. JEBB AND DR W. G. HEADLAM

BY

A. C. PEARSON, M.A.

FORMERLY SCHOLAR OF CHRIST'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE

VOLUME I

Cambridge :
at the University Press

1917

PREFACE

THE production of this book has been delayed by various causes, which require particular notice on the occasion of its appearance. It is well known that Sir Richard Jebb intended ultimately to include the Fragments in his edition of Sophocles; and in pursuance of this intention he delivered at Cambridge in the Michaelmas Term of 1895 a course of lectures on 132 selected fragments. The Ajax, the last to be published of the seven extant plays, appeared in the autumn of 1896; and it was then anticipated that the publication of the Fragments would be undertaken in due sequence. But the discovery of the Bacchylides papyrus drew the editor's attention in another direction, and, during the remainder of his life, the time which he could spare from public duties was mainly devoted to the preparation of a comprehensive edition of the Poems and Fragments of Bacchylides, which was published by the Cambridge University Press in 1905. Thus it fell out that, when after Sir Richard Jebb's death the task of completing the edition of Sophocles devolved upon Dr Walter Headlam, the material available for his use consisted solely of the notes prepared for the lectures already mentioned.

Once again misfortune attended the prosecution of the scheme, in consequence of the premature death of Dr Headlam before he was able to put into shape the preliminary labour which for a number of months he had expended upon the text. Towards the end of 1908 I was entrusted by the Syndics of the University Press with the papers of both scholars, in order that the work so long deferred might be brought to a conclusion. I will frankly admit that, though conscious of having assumed a serious burden, I did not at first adequately realize either the magnitude or the difficulty of the task.

I am afraid that, after these preliminary remarks, readers will be disappointed to find how small a share in the contents of these volumes has been contributed by my predecessors. Headlam, according to his wont, set to work thoroughly to explore the ground which he was preparing to develop, but he left very little evidence of the results at which he had arrived, and hardly anything in such a shape as could be adapted readily for publication. Yet even the adversaria of so eminent a scholar are of considerable interest, and not a few instances will be found where his insight has pointed out the way leading to the solution of a puzzling problem. Jebb's notes were of an entirely different character. Although well fitted to introduce to an undergraduate audience the salient features of some of the most interesting fragments, they were obviously unsuitable for reproduction as containing the matured judgement of their author upon the critical and exegetical questions which these fragments raise. They were chiefly the record of first impressions drawn up with the skill and taste which we have learnt to expect from such a source, but made without much exercise of independent research, or a full recognition of the departmental literature bearing upon the subject, so far as it was at that time accessible. To have printed any considerable portion of these notes would have been both misleading and unfair. Indeed, I am doubtful if I have not gone too far in including so much as will be found below; and it is with the greatest reluctance that I have in several cases quoted Jebb's notes, where I felt bound to argue in favour of a different conclusion. But my guiding principle has been this. The obscurity of the text of these fragments is so great, and so little has been done to dispel it, that we can only hope to arrive at the truth by a patient sifting of the clues suggested by competent authorities; and an editor may often best recommend the solution which he considers probable by canvassing the views of other workers in the same field. Anyhow by this method the reader is the better enabled to form his own judgement on the issues submitted to him: securus iudicat orbis terrarum.

It will now be apparent that not only the responsibility for everything that appears in these volumes is entirely my own, but also the bulk of the commentary itself¹. I must therefore explain the lines upon which I have worked. The general plan, modified only so far as was required by difference of subject-matter, was prescribed by the character of the earlier volumes, and, although my predecessors had not advanced far in the appointed track, they had at least made it plain that the chief feature of the book should be a thorough and searching exegesis. Translation was less essential than in the complete plays and often impossible; but in some of the longer fragments I am fortunate in being able to quote renderings made by Jebb and Headlam. In the elucidation of fragmentary and corrupt texts criticism and interpretation are complementary of each other. I have therefore endeavoured to present the critical data in as accurate a form as possible, taking Nauck's edition as my basis, and verifying, supplementing, and correcting its results so far as my opportunities permitted. It has not been possible for me to obtain unpublished information concerning the readings of the MSS of authors which have not been edited in accordance with the requirements of modern criticism; but I have endeavoured to make myself acquainted with published results, although I cannot feel confident of having surveyed every part of so wide a field. In this respect not much has been done since the appearance of Nauck's second edition. It is true that editions of Stobaeus and Plutarch's Moralia, two of our most important sources, have been completed by Hense and Bernardakis. But Hense's results had been already communicated to Nauck, and the character of Bernardakis's edition is such that it is almost entirely useless for the present purpose. Our knowledge of the most important scholia is still imperfect, although progress has been made, especially in regard to Aristophanes and Pindar. Wendel's edition of the scholia to Theocritus appeared while this book was passing through the press. Much might be learnt from a critical edition of Eustathius, which is scarcely to be expected at present. But the lexicographers are the most promising field of all, and, though a good deal of work has been done in sifting their records, very little of it has seen the light. Bethe's Pollux and de Stefani's Etymologicum Gudianum are both incomplete. Here too the recovery of fresh material from unedited sources which may be still preserved in the libraries of Europe has been shown to be more than a possibility by the labours of Reitzenstein, Rabe, and others.

¹ The letters J. and H. have been attached to the notes of Jebb and Headlam now first printed, and their full names are retained in references to their published writings.

The actual increase of material that has accrued in the last twenty-five years is not completely measured by the fact that this edition contains almost exactly 100 more fragments than were published by Nauck. A considerable proportion of the accession comes from the recently discovered commencement of Photius, published by Reitzenstein in 1907. But the most important addition of all was of course the fragments of the Ichneutae and Eurypylus contained in the ninth volume of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri. The discovery was made at a time when the greater part of the present commentary was written, and I am glad to be able now to express my thanks to Prof. A. S. Hunt, who was kind enough to allow me to inspect the sheets of the new fragments before publication, and has more than once replied to my queries concerning the actual readings of the MS in doubtful cases. I must also acknowledge my indebtedness to the Committee of the Egypt Exploration Fund and the Delegates of the Clarendon Press for permission to include the Oxyrhynchus fragments in the pages of this edition.

In the General Introduction I have endeavoured to describe the literary history of Sophoclean tragedy, to estimate the extent and variety of its activity, to discover the vestiges of the material with which it worked, and to show how its monuments were transmitted to posterity until they passed into oblivion and how finally its scanty relics were preserved for the instruction of our own times. In this way I have tried to answer the questions, why the majority of the plays were lost, and by what means their fragments survived. It will be evident that the third section follows in the main the lines which have been sketched in various writings by Prof. von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff. In dealing with the sources of our existing fragments I have entered at some length into the history of Greek philological literature during the Roman and Byzantine ages, confining myself particularly to its connexion with the study of Sophocles. This is an arid region; yet I am convinced that those who make themselves acquainted with its chief features will return not only with a clearer understanding of the limits within which the criticism of the Greek poets must proceed, but also with a deeper respect for the honest labours of generations of workers who struggled against the forces of barbarism to keep alive the purity of the classic speech. So much misconception prevails as to the significance of quotations made by these writers that no apology is needed for the space which has been devoted to them. The only work of reference in English which touches this branch of literature is Sir J. E. Sandys's History of Classical Scholarship.

Shortly after the printing had commenced, it was decided to take advantage of the occasion by the preparation of a comprehensive index to the whole of the ten volumes. For this purpose Prof. Jebb's seven volumes have been carefully re-read, the old indexes have been consolidated, corrected, and considerably enlarged, and the entries so collected have been incorporated with those relating to the three volumes of Fragments. The work was at first undertaken by Mr G. V. Carey of Gonville and Caius College, who re-indexed the Ajax and Antigone; but, when he obtained a commission in the Army on the outbreak of the European War, the responsibility for the remaining portions passed into my hands. It is hoped that the new indexes will be of service to students not only as a better means of access to the information which the volumes contain, but also as a register of Sophoclean usage for anyone who may attempt further researches in the sphere of tragic vocabulary and grammar. At the same time their users should be warned that they do not pretend to be anything more than a record of the material comprised in the commentaries; for an attempt to provide by this means a complete digest of the language would have involved an enormous addition to a labour which was already sufficiently arduous.

I have elsewhere discussed and tabulated the researches of those modern scholars who since the close of the eighteenth century have laboured directly on the fragments of Sophocles, and it is unnecessary to repeat here the nature of my obligations to them. Most of this literature is scattered in various periodicals or contained in dissertations which are even more difficult of access. In this connexion my thanks are due to Prof. R. Reitzenstein of Freiburg for supplying me with information respecting the contents of one of his dissertations which I had been unable to procure. Nor must I forget to mention the singular kindness of the late Dr Siegfried Mekler of Vienna, the editor of Dindorf's Sophocles in the Teubner series, who, hearing that I was engaged on this work, sent me a number of notes bearing on various points of difficulty. This will explain the occasional references to Mekler's unpublished views. Dr J. B. Pearson and Mr R. D. Hicks have kindly permitted me to print extracts from certain notes formerly communicated to Prof. Jebb in reference to frs. 776 and 1128. Notwithstanding the considerable output of labour directed to the criticism of the fragments, the attention which they have received is scanty in comparison with the mass of comment which has accumulated upon the extant plays. Hence I have been often compelled to rely largely on my own resources. This is, in fact, the first systematic effort that has been made to put together a continuous commentary, though I have the best of reasons for knowing that its imperfections are not due to that cause alone. I must warn readers that the printing of the book was seriously delayed by the stress of recent events and that it went to the press at the beginning of 1913. Everyone knows the difficulties and inconsistencies that are apt to occur in such cases, and that they cannot be satisfactorily cured by the list of corrigenda.

I desire to acknowledge the generous support which I have throughout received from the Syndics of the Cambridge University Press, although the work has grown to a size which neither they nor I contemplated at the time of its inception.

A. C. P.

February, 1916.

CONTENTS OF VOLUME I

	PAGES
PREFACE	v—x
GENERAL INTRODUCTION
§ 1. The number of the plays . . .	xiii—xxii
§ 2. The subjects of the plays . . .	xxii—xxxii
§ 3. The tradition of the text . . .	xxxii—xlvi
§ 4. The sources of the fragments . .	xlvi—xci
§ 5. Bibliography	xci—c
FRAGMENTS OF NAMED PLAYS:
Introductions, text and notes . . .	i—270

GENERAL INTRODUCTION

§ 1. The number of the plays.

THE anonymous Life of Sophocles¹ records on the authority of Aristophanes of Byzantium that 130² plays were attributed to Sophocles, but that 17 of these were spurious. The statement is entitled to credit, as coming from Aristophanes; and it has been referred with high probability to his work entitled *πρὸς τοὺς Καλλιμάχου πίνακας*³. Not much is known of the book in question, but it may be taken to have contained corrections and enlargements of the well-known πίνακες of Callimachus, which was not merely a catalogue of the books contained in the Alexandrian library, but included biographical details concerning the various authors, and in the case of the Attic drama the dates of the production of the several plays, as well as other points of interest drawn from the διδασκαλίας of Aristotle⁴.

Suidas, however, reports that Sophocles produced 123 plays, and according to some authorities considerably more. This information may be reconciled with the Life in two ways, i.e. by the adoption either of Boeckh's⁵ correction of Suidas, which makes the total 113 (ργ' in place of ρκγ'), or of Bergk's⁷

¹ xi p. liv Bl. ἔχει δὲ δράματα, ὥς φησιν Ἀριστοφάνης, ἑκατὸν τριάκοντα, τούτων δὲ νεώτευται δεκάεπτά.

² ρλ' cod. A. Other MSS give ρδ', which is the vulgate. There was clearly a confusion of the uncials A and Δ, and the evidence of Suidas indicates that the number intended was 130 rather than 104.

³ ἔχει implies a reference to an established authority. The vulg. ἔγραψε should be rejected.

⁴ By Dindorf and others. For the work itself see Susemihl, Al. Lit. i 392, 443; Nauck, Ar. Byz. p. 243 ff.

⁵ See schol. Ar. Nub. 552; Susemihl, i 327 ff.; O. Schneider, Callim. ii 306.

⁶ Tr. Gr. princ. p. 110.

⁷ In the Preface to his text of Sophocles (1858), p. xxxix.

substitution of 7 for 17 (ζ' for ιζ') in the Life. The latter proposal is palaeographically the easier, and the number 123 agrees better than 113 with the remaining data, as will presently appear.

Number of victories.

The number of his victories is also variously recorded. According to Suidas, they were twenty-four; according to the Life, which followed the authority of Caristius of Pergamum¹, twenty; and, according to Diodorus, only² eighteen. The last-mentioned statement is now confirmed by the evidence of a recently discovered inscription³. Further, we are informed by the Life⁴ that, in addition to the twenty victories, he several times gained the second prize, but never the third. Cratinus⁵ intimates that on one occasion at least Sophocles was refused a chorus altogether; but, even if the statement is literally correct, it is impossible to determine whether the plays written for that occasion were or were not included in the total number assigned to Sophocles by Aristophanes. It is conceivable, though not very probable, that the number of victories recorded by Suidas included occasions on which Sophocles received the second prize⁶. Others have thought that the inclusion of Lenaeon victories is the cause of the discrepancy; and a parallel has been found in the case of Cratinus, who, though credited with only three victories at the Lenaea in the inscription already quoted, reaches the total attributed to him by Suidas by means of six others gained at the City festival⁷. This view is sufficiently plausible, and it would perhaps be unnecessary to look further, if it were not for the comparative unimportance of the Lenaea

¹ He belongs to the second century B.C. The reference is to his treatise περὶ διδασκαλιῶν (Athen. 235 E: FHG IV 359).

² 13. 103.

³ CIA II 977 a, where [Σοφο]κλῆς ΔΓIII was restored by Bergk (Rh. Mus. xxxiv 298).

⁴ v p. li Blaydes.

⁵ fr. 15 (I 16 K.).

⁶ Cf. the use of νικῶν in the fifth Argument to the Nubes (Arist. fr. 621 Rose).

⁷ The explanation was first put forward by Bergk in Rh. Mus. xxxiv 298. It is accepted by Haigh, *Antic Theatre*³, pp. 28, 46; but by a curious slip the number of the victories won by Cratinus at the two festivals is inverted. The text is thus at variance with the inscriptions quoted on pp. 363, 364. See also Wilhelm, Urkunden, p. 106.

in the history of tragedy¹. At the same time, where numerals are concerned, we must not neglect their constant liability to suffer corruption². However this may be, eighteen victories at the City Dionysia, where tetralogies were always produced, involved the performance of seventy-two plays. Of the remaining fifty-one in the Alexandrian list, it is reasonable to suppose, even when we bear in mind Sophocles' extraordinary popularity, that at least nine tetralogies—if not more—consisted of plays which obtained the second prize. The calculation leaves little room for exhibition at the Lenaea, so that, if performances at that festival are used to account for the twenty-four victories mentioned by Suidas, it would follow that the titles of many of the plays which Sophocles produced were unknown to the Alexandrians.

Objection has been taken³ to the number 123 on the ground that it cannot be divided into tetralogies. But several explanations are possible. Thus, since the evidence concerning the Lenaea seems to establish the fact that tragedies were produced in groups of three rather than of four, the inclusion of such plays might account for the odd number. Or, again, since we know that the Oedipus Coloneus was not produced until after the death of its author, it is possible, as Dindorf suggested⁴, that he left only three plays ready to be included in his thirty-first tetralogy, and that Sophocles the younger added the fourth. Further, it is almost certain that the Archelaus and Andromache of Euripides⁵ were not included in the official lists of tetralogies (διδασκαλῖαι); and it is quite possible that similar exceptions were known to exist among the authentic works of Sophocles.

¹ For the fifth century we have no evidence except the record of Agathon's victory (Athen. 217 A; cf. Plat. Symp. 173 A), and the inscription relating to 419 and 418 (CIA II 972). From the latter it is inferred that each poet submitted three plays. The Lenaea was perhaps reserved for inexperienced or mediocre playwrights (Haigh, op. cit. p. 28).

² Bergk thought that κ' in the Life might be an error for κδ'.

³ See Christ-Schmid, *Gr. Literaturgesch.*⁶ p. 3158, where the statement of Aristophanes is now accepted.

⁴ ed. 1860, p. xxxv.

⁵ Vit. Eur. p. 4 Dind.; schol. Eur. Andr. 445. The latter passage has occasioned much curious speculation, which need not detain us here.

Early loss
of plays.

In the next place, it will be observed that, whereas in the case of Euripides we have a definite statement that 78 plays out of a total number of 92 were extant at Alexandria¹, no similar information is available in relation to Sophocles. Yet the general probabilities of the case, as well as the analogy of the history of the other tragedians, forbid us to believe that Aristophanes had access to copies of all the plays whose titles were taken into account in his calculation of the total. The conclusion is assisted by the fact that losses of certain dramas are actually recorded in some of the extant Arguments². Elmsley has shown³ that satyr-plays in particular often failed to survive, so that their existence was only known from their appearance in the διδασκαλῖαι: whether his criticism is applicable to the Sophoclean tradition will be considered later.

Numbers assigned to certain plays.

A further question arises in regard to the puzzling statement in the Argument to the Antigone, that the play is reckoned as the thirty-second⁴. The figures recorded for the Alcestis, the Aves, the Dionysalexandros of Cratinus, and the Imbrians of Menander, 17, 35, 8 and some figure between 71 and 79 respectively, require examination in the same connexion⁵; but for the present purpose we must confine ourselves to the Antigone. The extant Aeschylean catalogue suggests that the figure might refer to the alphabetical order, and some critics have inclined to this view⁶. Inasmuch, however, as some twenty-three titles beginning with A are known, in order to satisfy an alphabetical arrangement we should be obliged to assume that at least nine others were lost, and to place the Antigone last in

¹ For an elucidation of the tradition see Dieterich in Pauly-Wissowa VI 1247.

² See the Arguments to the Medea, the Phoenissae, and the Acharnians.

³ On Eur. Med. p. 239.

⁴ See Jebb's Introduction, § 22. For λέλεκται as indicating a reference to a catalogue see Wilamowitz, Anal. Eur. p. 133.

⁵ There is a discussion of the whole subject by R. C. Flickinger in Class. Phil. v 1-18. But the data have since been enlarged by the publication of Oxyr. Pap. 1235 (x p. 81 ff.), containing Arguments of Menander's plays. From this it appears that the Imbrians was numbered εβδομηκοστήν και...

⁶ So approximately Sussehl, I 338⁴⁸, who professes to follow Wilamowitz (Anal. Eur. p. 135). The latter, however, thinks that the library arrangement was based on a compromise between alphabetical order and similarity of subject (Einleitung in d. gr. Tr. p. 150).

order or nearly so. The improbability of the double assumption is so great that we must look elsewhere for an explanation of the numeral. But the chronological solution is also open to objections of considerable weight. As the plays were produced in tetralogies, it is strange that the Antigone rather than a satyr-play should have been reckoned as the last play of the eighth tetralogy¹. Further, if Sophocles only produced thirty-two plays in the first twenty-seven (or twenty-six) years of his dramatic career, it is surprising that he should have written as many as ninety-one in the last thirty-five (or thirty-six). However, the latter argument is not entirely convincing, since several reasons are conceivable which might favour an increased productivity in the poet's later life. Flickinger, who has made the most recent examination of the problem presented by these dramatic numerals, seems to be justified in concluding that their original function was to record the arrangement of the volumes in some library,—presumably the Alexandrian. If each play of which the library possessed a copy was distinguished by a numeral, it is unlikely that their arrangement was arbitrary rather than according to some rational system. For the purpose supposed a chronological basis becomes the more probable, since several of the early plays may have been lost; but we should still be obliged to infer that Sophocles increased the rate of his output subsequently to the date of the *Antigone*². It should be added that the recently discovered evidence respecting the Imbrians of Menander entirely confirms this conclusion. An alphabetical solution is absolutely excluded by the remaining titles, and moreover, since the roll to which the fragment belonged seems to have contained an alphabetical series of Arguments, the fact that the numerical order of the plays was also recorded clearly points to some other principle of arrangement. On the other hand, although the date of the Imbrians may be open to argument¹, the chronological solution would not involve any serious difficulty.

¹ The Lenaeae hypothesis will not serve here, since tragedies were not performed at that festival until after 440 (Capps, A.J.A. iv 86). Bergk avoided the difficulty by reading in the Argument to the Antigone: δεδιδασκται δὲ τὸ δράμα τοῦτο τριακοστὸν· δεύτερος <ῆ>. Jebb has given good reasons for rejecting his proposal.

² Flickinger is perhaps right in seeking to minimize the importance of this increase, if it actually occurred; but why does he assume (p. 13) that only one hundred of Sophocles' plays were known to the Alexandrians?

Number of extant titles.

Now that we have examined the external evidence bearing on the number of the plays, we must enquire how far the number of titles actually known to us from quotations corresponds with the total of 123 plays said to have been recorded by Aristophanes. The number of actual or ostensible titles of which we have information, including those of the seven surviving plays, is at least 132, but there is hardly any doubt that this total must be reduced for the purpose of ascertaining the correct number of the plays which the titles represent. Five certain cases of double titles have been counted as single plays in the reckoning adopted above, i.e. 'Ατρὲς ἡ Μυκηναῖαι, Μάντεις ἡ Πολύιδος, Ναυσικάα ἡ Πλύντριάι, Ὀδυσσεὺς ἀκανθοπλήξ ἡ Νίπτρα, Πανδώρα ἡ Σφυροκόποι. These double titles were chiefly, if not entirely, a device adopted by the grammarians in order to distinguish plays bearing the same title but written by different authors². It will be observed that in each case, except Ὀδυσσεὺς ἀκανθοπλήξ ἡ Νίπτρα, the name of a leading character is combined with a name taken from the chorus; and in view of the prevalence of the latter among the titles of Aeschylus, it may be conjectured that the chorus-names Μυκηναῖαι, Μάντεις, Πλύντριάι, and Σφυροκόποι, were the original designations chosen by Sophocles. It sometimes happens that this practice of the grammarians, instead of tending to precision, is actually a source of confusion, when quotations are made by means of one or the other of the alternative titles, so that, unless there is independent evidence of the combination, two different plays appear to be cited. Thus it is highly probable that the Αἰθίοπες should be identified with the Μέμνων (I p. 22), the Κάμικοι with the Μίνως (II p. 4), and the Ἡρακλῆς (but not the Ἡρακλεῖσκος) with the ἐπὶ Ταϊνάρῳ σάτυροι (I p. 167). The probable identity of the Ἐπίγονοι with the Ἐριφύλη (I p. 129) only differs in so far as Ἐπίγονοι is not a name given to the chorus, but serves, like Ἐπτά ἐπὶ Θήβας, as a succinct description of the subject-matter,

¹ Oxyr. Pap. x p. 83.

² Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 399 f.

—the second expedition against Thebes. The proposed identifications of the Δόλοπες with the Φοῖνιξ (I p. 120), of the second Φινεύς with the Τυμπαρισταί (II p. 313 f.), and of the Φθιώτιδες with the Ἑρμιόνη (II p. 306), are much more disputable. A still more frequent source of error was the substitution for the true title of the name of one of the principal characters; but, though scholars seem sometimes tacitly to approve such combinations as Οἰνόμαος ἢ Ἱπποδάμεια¹, they are not really instances of double titles deliberately adopted by author or critic, but the results of lapse of memory, carelessness of citation, or confusion by a copyist. The matter is of so much importance not merely to the present investigation, but also to the arrangement and interpretation of the Fragments themselves, that we must first establish beyond the possibility of dispute that such errors are not infrequent. Now, the Orestes of Euripides is sometimes entitled Electra in late MSS (see e.g. C.R. II 172), just as conversely Longinus περὶ εὐρέσεως (Walz, Rhet. Gr. IX 589) refers to El. 1122 as spoken by Electra in the Orestes. Similarly, the Phoenissae appears as the Oedipus (C.R. II 172), the Bacchae as the *Pentheus*², the Hippolytus as the *Phaedra*³, and the Troades as the *Hecuba*⁴. Hence we are not surprised to find that the Oenomaus is cited once as the *Hippodamia*⁵, the Daedalus once as the *Talos*⁶, the Heracles once as the *Cerberus*⁷, and the Tyro once as the *Pelias*⁸. It is difficult to avoid the conclusion that Ion was an alternative title for the Creusa (II p. 23), and Clytaemnestra either for the Iphigenia or the Aegisthus (I p. 219); but hesitation is pardonable before we accept the identification of the Theseus with the Phaedra (or the Aegeus: I p. 184), of the Acrisius with the Danae (I p. 38), of the Aletes with the Erigone (I p. 173), of the Andromache with the Pastores (I p. 78), or of the Tyndareus with the Aletes (II p. 268). It happens occasionally, though much less frequently, that a play is cited by the name not of a character, but of a person who is described

The title is so printed by Dindorf and Nauck (TGF p. 233).

So cod. L and the codd. of Stob. flor. 36. 9 and 74. 8.

So cod. L and Eustath. Il. p. 490, 23.

⁴ Welcker, Gr. Trag. p. 456.

⁵ fr. 472.

⁶ fr. 161.

⁷ fr. 224.

⁸ fr. 648.

or referred to by one or more of the speakers. We do not know enough about the Licymnius of Euripides to feel sure that the misquotation of fr. 472 in Bachm. anecd. I p. 412, 7 as coming from the Heracles is an error of this kind; but there can be no doubt in regard to schol. Plat. rep. 361 B, where Aesch. Theb. 579 ff. are cited as Δισχύλου ἐξ' Ἀμφιαράου. A similar example is probably to be found in Soph. fr. 731, where, following Hartung, I have suggested that ἐν Ἰάμβῃ covers a reference to the Triptolemus, and the mysterious title Ξοανηφόροι (fr. 452) may perhaps be explained as an allusion to a particular scene in the Laocoon. An error more easily detected is the ascription of a play to the wrong author, that is to say, to Aeschylus or Euripides instead of to Sophocles, or to Sophocles instead of to Aeschylus or Euripides. In the result there may be occasional difficulties respecting the genuineness of individual fragments¹, but the discovery of the mistake seldom effects the removal of a title from one tragedian to another. Relying on the existence of this source of error, scholars have refused to credit the statement that Sophocles wrote a *Prometheus*²; and similarly Welcker conjectured that the titles Ixion and Sisyphus belonged exclusively to Aeschylus and Euripides³. Important additions to the text of Sophocles, which result from the recognition of an error in the statement of authorship, will be found in frs. 581 and 684. Another cause of disturbance is the doubt which exists as to the number of plays corresponding to the titles Atræus and Thyestes, and Phineus and Tympanistæ; and it is uncertain whether the titles Ἑλένη, Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις, and Ἑλένης ἀρπαγή, imply the existence of three, two, or only one play.

When we have made allowance for all these disquieting considerations, we shall probably be disposed to deduct some twenty titles from the 132 mentioned above, so that of the 123 known to Aristophanes of Byzantium we are still able to identify about 112. Of all these there is, so far as I can see, only one, the *Iberes*¹, of which it might be thought that it no longer existed in the Alexandrian epoch; and even of it we can only say that there is no positive indication of its survival. It has already been remarked that we have no record of the number of Sophoclean plays which were preserved in the Alexandrian library. Now, if Boeckh's hypothesis² were correct, it would follow that we are still able to trace practically all the genuine plays as having passed into the keeping of the Alexandrians. But it is in the highest degree improbable that copies of every one of them survived throughout the interval between the fifth and third centuries. On the other hand, if we accept 123 as the actual total of the genuine titles, we are now in a position to say that some 110 of the plays to which they belonged were known to the students of Alexandria. It is reasonable to infer that there are very few indeed³ of which Alexandria has left us no trace, and the result is a very remarkable testimony to the accuracy and comprehensiveness of our sources.

¹ For examples see on frs. 14, 1080, Eur. frs. 474, 515, schol. Hom. τ 471 (attributing Aesch. Ag. 282 to Sophocles), Hesych. I p. 227 ἀπαρθένευτα· οὐ πρόποντα παρθένοισ. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰφιγενεία τῇ ἐν Αὔλιδι (i.e. Eur. I.A. 993). Hence frs. 583, 769 and 941 have been assigned by some to Euripides.

² Schol. Pind. Pyth. 5. 35, where however Schroeder suspects that a reference to the Κολχίδες (fr. 340) has fallen out.

³ See I p. 213, II p. 185.

The information available respecting the satyr-plays is not such as to disturb the previous calculation. There are sixteen plays universally admitted or strictly proved to be satyric⁴. To these we need not hesitate to add Δαίδαλος and Ἡρακλείσκος. The Ἰναχος and Σύνδειπνοι were either formally satyr-plays, or at least belonged to the same category as the Alceſtis, so that they might have served as substitutes for satyr-plays in the last place of the tetralogy. Of the other titles those which seem most suitable for inclusion in a list of satyr-plays are Μοῦσαι, Σίσυφος, and Φαίακες; and, since the return of Perseus after his adventures was a favourite subject in this kind of drama⁵, there

¹ The relevance to Sophocles of this title is now disputed: Christ-Schmid, op. cit. p. 3181.

² See p. xiii.

³ It is possible that we know them all, just as we can identify all those of Euripides which were preserved: see Dieterich in Pauly-Wissowa VI 1248.

⁴ The names are as follows: Ἄμυκος, Ἀμφιάρεως, Ἀχιλλέως ἑρασταί, Διονυσίσκος, Ἑλένης γάμος, Ἐρις, Ἡρακλῆς, Ἰχθυεῖναι, Κηδάλων, Κρίσις, Κωφοί, Μῶμος, Παρδώρα, Σαλμωνεύς, Τήλεφος, Ἵβρις.

⁵ Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 392.

is perhaps more to be said for Meineke's conjecture concerning the Δανάη than the particular evidence relating to it seems to suggest¹. It is possible that we should add the Chryses, for reasons given in the Introductory Note. Satyr-plays were not produced at the Lenaea; but even if we make a liberal allowance for the inclusion in the list of plays performed at this festival, it seems clear that several satyr-plays were lost before the time of Aristophanes. This is no more than might have been expected, in view of the scantiness of the information concerning them which we owe to the Alexandrians².

§ 2. The subjects of the plays.

Classification of subjects.

The subjects chosen by Sophocles for the composition of his plays were taken exclusively from ancient legends. When we seek to analyse and arrange them, various methods of classification are possible. Thus the locality to which each particular story belonged might be adopted as the guiding principle of division; and such a course would be justified, if the dramatic stories rested chiefly upon oral tradition, gathered directly or indirectly from different quarters of the Hellenic world. But, except incidentally or when belonging to Attica itself, the material of tragedy is not drawn from myths of merely local circulation. It was shaped from the κλέα ἀνδρῶν which rhapsodes had sung from time immemorial throughout the length and breadth of Greece—καθ' Ἑλλάδα καὶ μέσον Ἄργος. Not that local associations are entirely to be neglected: the dramas whose scenes were laid in Attica, Boeotia, or Aetolia, tend to be grouped together, even where some other link has been chosen for their connexion. Genealogical affinity is a more promising point of departure. Every noble family could trace its descent, through generations of heroic ancestors, back to Dorus, Xuthus, and Aeolus, the sons of Hellen. The cherished unity of race was maintained by a network of relationships stretching from Thessaly to Sparta, and from Elis to Orchomenus. It would be easy, with the information at our command, to distribute among the chief houses the tales of the sufferings and achievements of their successive representatives. To this aspect of the matter we shall presently return. But the mythical past was not merely treasured in family chronicles; it supplied the record of the glorious beginnings of Greek history. 'Pelops' line' was linked indissolubly with 'the tale of Troy divine.' The orderly disposition of the early saga, which preserved it as the common heritage of later ages, was mainly the work of the epic poets. To Sophocles the legends of Hellas were permanently embedded in its poetry; and the task of cataloguing his plays will only be adequately performed, in so far as we succeed in discovering their literary sources.

¹ 1 pp. 38, 115.

² The effect of schol. Ar. Kan. 1124 seems to be that Aristarchus and Apollonius disregarded the satyric play in speaking of Aeschylean tetralogies (or trilogies) like the Oresteia. The Proteus itself was familiar ground to the Alexandrians (TGF p. 70). They knew of only eight of Euripides' satyr-plays, including one of doubtful authenticity. The marginalia to the Ichneutae are very meagre. See also p. xvi3.

Although the data available for the reconstruction of the lost plays are lamentably scanty, we are generally in a position to recognize the chief features of the stories which Sophocles adapted for the stage. The surviving titles entirely confirm the testimony of Zoilus, the speaker in Athenaeus¹, that 'Sophocles delighted in the epic Cycle to such an extent that throughout the whole of a play he would follow closely the epic narrative.' To the same effect the author of the anonymous Life²: 'His plots follow in the tracks of Homer, and in several of his plays he produces an exact copy of the Odyssey.' But it was not merely in the structure of his plots that Sophocles was considered a follower of Homer. In the delineation of character and in the artistic expression of his thought the writings of Sophocles seemed to revive the charm of Homer's poetry³. Aristotle had compared the art of Sophocles with that of Homer⁴; and Polemo

Influence
of Homer.

¹ 277 E. For Casaubon's note on this passage see § 5.

² XII p. liv Bl. The words which precede (τὸ πᾶν μὲν οὖν Ὀμηρικῶς ἀνόμεμα) are unintelligible. Bergk proposed οἰκονομεῖ for ἀνόμεμα: one might also suggest Ὀμηρικὸς ἀνομάζετο.

³ vit. Soph. XIII p. lv Bl. ἡθοιοίει δὲ καὶ ποικίλλει καὶ τοῖς ἐπινοήμασι τεχνικῶς χρῆται, Ὀμηρικὴν ἐκματτόμενος χάριν.

⁴ poet. 3. 1448^a 26.

the Academic took an equal pleasure in Homer and in Sophocles, declaring that Homer was an epic Sophocles, Sophocles a tragic Homer¹. It was chiefly in respect of his diction that Sophocles was called 'the most Homeric' of Attic poets; but his most intimate point of contact with the Homeric spirit was his refusal to employ his art for the purpose of fostering religious enthusiasm, of promoting a purer morality, or of freeing the mind from conventional shackles, while he laboured to create afresh the heroic figures of ancient legend, and to present under new conditions the majesty of the life which Homer had first portrayed.

The Homeric element in Sophocles' style is easily recognizable, but the evidence which establishes his close adherence to Homeric models must not be taken to imply that, as a dramatic poet, he was deficient in inventive power. We infer simply that, in erecting the framework of his plays, Sophocles selected Homeric material to a larger extent than his fellow tragedians. For this purpose no distinction need be drawn between 'Homer' and the poems of the epic Cycle. Down to about 500 B.C. no doubt had arisen that the latter were actually written by Homer², and the popular conception remained unshaken until a much later date. When Aeschylus said that his tragedies were slices from Homer's ample feast³, it is beyond question that he was not referring to the Iliad and Odyssey alone. Indeed, it is extremely unlikely that the phrase 'epic Cycle' or even the notion which it expressed had come into existence during the lifetime of Sophocles⁴. What then precisely was the epic Cycle? The answer is given by certain extracts from the chrestomathia of Proclus the Neoplatonist⁵, which are preserved partly in the

¹ Diog. L. 4. 20, Suid. s.v. Πολέμων.

² See T. W. Allen in C. Q. 11 88; the evidence is given by Christ-Schmid, op. cit. p. 92.

³ Athen. 347 E.

⁴ Monro, Hom. Od. p. 346, pointed out that there is no evidence of κύκλος ἐπῶν, or any such phrase, having existed before the time of Aristotle. Christ-Schmid, op. cit. p. 92, now take the same view. The inferiority to Homer of his rivals in the same field is asserted in Isocr. 12. 263, and the transferred sense of κυκλικός at Alexandria (Callim. ap. A.P. 12. 43) indicates that the notion of 'cyclic poetry' had been taken over from the Peripatetics.

⁵ A considerable controversy has arisen in recent years over these extracts.

bibliotheca of the patriarch Photius (f. 318 B 21) and partly in MSS of Homer, i.e. chiefly in Ven. A supplemented by the Escorial and other less well known copies. What is called the epic Cycle commenced, according to Proclus, with the fabled union of Uranus and Gaia, and contained all the myths relating to the gods as well as such historical facts as emerged in the course of the description. It was the work of various poets, and came to an end with the landing of Odysseus on the coast of Ithaca, when his son Telegonus unwittingly slew him. Proclus adds that the preservation and currency of the epic Cycle were to be ascribed not so much to its merit as to the orderly sequence of events which it contained (τὴν ἀκολουθίαν τῶν ἐν αὐτῷ πραγμάτων). The later extracts, which are on a larger scale, relate to the subject-matter of the Cycle, and comprise what purports to be an abstract, beginning with the Cypria and ending with the Telegony, of six epics covering the period of the Trojan war. The character of Proclus's evidence and the value to be attributed to it were materially affected by the discovery of its affinity to the mythographical handbook which, though known as the bibliotheca of Apollodorus, was certainly not the work of the famous grammarian of the second century B.C. The bibliotheca, as formerly known from the available MSS, broke off abruptly in the course of a description of the adventures of Theseus, but the discovery in 1885 and 1887 of an abbreviated form of the conclusion in two separate but parallel fragments proved that it originally extended as far as the death of Odysseus¹. Now these fragments, so far as they comprise the Trojan story, agree so remarkably both in substance and in Extreme views are represented on the one hand by Bethe (Herm. XXVI 593), who refuses to acknowledge that they have any value at all, and on the other by T. W. Allen in C. Q. II 64, 81, who seems to be almost alone in holding that the Cyclic epics survived until the fifth century A.D. It is not universally admitted that the grammarian and the Neoplatonist were identical. See W. Schmid in Rh. Mus. XLIX 133 ff. and BphW 1907, 5 f.

¹ The fragments were published respectively by R. Wagner from a Vatican MS (950) of the fourteenth century, and by Papadopoulos-Kerameus in Rh. Mus. XLVI 161 ff. from a Jerusalem MS. They will be found, together with the extracts of Proclus, in the first volume of the Teubner Mythographi Graeci (ed. R. Wagner), 1894.

language with Proclus's epitome of the six Cyclic epics that there can be no hesitation in attributing to them a common origin. The inference is drawn that there lay at the basis of the mythographical compendium which was produced, whether by Dionysius the Cyclograph¹ or another, in late Alexandrian times, and was the common source of the extant mythographical literature, a composition known as the 'cycle of the events described by the epic poets' (κύκλος ὑπὸ τῶν ἐπικοποιῶν ἱστορημένος). From the inclusion of their works in this cycle the term Cyclic was transferred from the handbook to the poems themselves². The Alexandrian κύκλος was not intended to serve a literary purpose, that is to say, the provision for readers of the old epics of detailed information about them, but rather to supply people of ordinary education with a succinct digest of mythical history based upon the writings of the ancient poets. Proclus indicates that the poems themselves were valued chiefly as authoritative records of the events which they described³. We should not therefore be surprised if the ostensible epitome, particularly in the form in which it has come down to us, is found to contain some elements foreign to the original sources, or even at variance with the other vestiges of our fragmentary knowledge concerning them⁴. Now, it will be observed that,

¹ Diod. 3, 66 is a passage often quoted: Διονυσίῳ τῷ συνταξαμένῳ τὰς παλαιὰς μυθοποιίας· οὗτος γὰρ τὰ τε περὶ τὸν Διόνυσον καὶ τὰς Ἀμαζόντας, ἐπὶ δὲ τοὺς Ἀργοναύτας, καὶ τὰ κατὰ τὸν Ἰλιακὸν πόλεμον πραχθέντα, καὶ πόλλ' ἕτερα συντέτακται, παρατιθεὶς τὰ ποιήματα τῶν ἀρχαίων, τῶν τε μυθολόγων καὶ τῶν ποιητῶν. This quotation however refers to Dionysius Scytobrachion, the writer (among other works) of a 'romance' Argonautica, who is frequently cited by Diodorus and the scholia on Apollonius, and is sometimes confused (e.g. by Christ-Schmid, op. cit. p. 93) with Dionysius the Cyclograph. See Susemihl, II 45, 57; E. Schwartz in Pauly-Wissowa V 928, 932. There were of course several such κύκλοι, among others that of a certain Theodorus, whose account was followed in the Tabula Iliaca.

² This account chiefly follows the article by E. Schwartz in Pauly-Wissowa I 2875-2886. No apology is needed for the prominence given to the subject; for some understanding of the development of mythological literature between Hesiod and Hyginus is necessary to a correct appreciation of the evidence touching the subject-matter of the several plays.

³ The reference must be assumed to be to the time when the ἐπικός κύκλος was put in circulation, perhaps in the first century B.C.

⁴ These discrepancies were used by Bethe to assail the trustworthiness of Proclus. A flagrant instance is the statement in the epitome of the Cypris that Paris captured

although we have in Proclus a complete summary of the tale of Troy, we know nothing whatever about the epics from which the beginning of the cycle was made up. The analysis of the poems which covered the period stretching from the marriage of Uranus and Gaia to the opening of the Cypria is entirely lost. It is unfortunate that the gap cannot be filled up with material drawn from other quarters: for even though we might learn but little of their distinctive versions, it would be instructive to discover the names of those poems which Alexandrian Scholarship regarded as the most authoritative documents concerning the early myths. The reference in Athenaeus to Sophocles' fondness for the epic Cycle follows immediately upon a quotation from the Titanomachia, which suggests that that poem was included in the Cycle. But the first place in order of time is claimed for a Cyclic Theogony, which is to be distinguished from Hesiod's work of the same name¹. The only other poems which by general consent are assigned to the epic Cycle are the *Thebais*², its sequel the Epigoni, and its precursor the Oedipodea. The relation of the Ἀμφιάρεω ἐξέλασις to the other Theban epics, and consequently to the Cycle, is quite uncertain³. The rest is guesswork: some favour the inclusion of the Οἰχαλίας ἄλωσις, of the Phocais, and of the *Danaïs*⁴, but the supposed antiquity of their origin is the only reason for their selection. There is a general impression that the Trojan series was the longest and most important part of the Cycle, but it rests upon no other evidence than the accidental preservation of Proclus's abstract. The Ionian epos, it is true, culminated in the Τρωικά; but, if the ἐπικὸς κύκλος was such as we have supposed, it must have taken notice of Heracles and Dionysus, of the Argonauts, of Perseus, and of Theseus. Epics, in addition to those named above, on these and other subjects were written by Eumelus, Sidon after the abduction of Helen, notwithstanding the evidence of Hdt. 2. 117. The version of Homer was preferred for the handbook here as in other cases.

¹ EGF p. 5. There is no direct evidence of the existence of this work. See now Dietze in Rh. Mus. LXIX 522.

² τὴν κυκλικὴν Θεβαΐδα, Athen. 465 E.

³ Introd. to Eur. Phoenissae, p. xix.

⁴ Christ-Schmid, op. cit. p. 100, treat these as outside the Cycle, owing to their non-Ionic character.

Cinaethon, and Asius; and these, as well as the anonymous Phoronis, Alcmaeonis, and Naupactia, must have exercised some influence upon Sophocles and the other tragedians. We may add the Aegimius, which is sometimes ascribed to Hesiod; but in their bearing upon Attic tragedy the most important of the Hesiodic poems was the γυναικῶν κατάλογος.

Classification of myths.

It appears from this discussion that, except in the case of the Trojan epics, and of these only in so far as we can rely on the statements of Proclus, it is impossible to make a list of Sophocles' literary sources so as to map out under each the plays whose plots are derived from them. The alternative has been adopted of arranging the plays according to the 'sequence of events' (ἀκολουθίαν τῶν πραγμάτων) as established by the handbook of pseudo-Apollodorus. It is true that this does not rest either directly or at all upon a series of abstracts or arguments (ὑποθέσεις) of poetical literature; and even where it seems to follow particular tragic authorities, it merely reflects the influence of tragedy upon the current conception of mythical history.¹ But the general outline which it presents corresponds in the main with the order in sequence of the myths as it was apprehended in the fifth century; and the genealogical framework by which the various episodes were held together must ultimately be traced to the influence of Hecataeus, of Acusilaus, and above all of Pherecydes of Leros, the somewhat older contemporary of Sophocles. The genealogies, again, though fixed and distributed by these chroniclers, were derived by them from early heroic poetry, perhaps above all from the κατάλογος of Hesiod.²

I. Theogony. In the earliest age of the world, before the power of the Olympians was firmly established, was set the scene of the Pandora, the Cedalion, the Triptolemus, the Thamyras, and the Ixion.

II. Issue of Deucalion: the Aeolids. The Aetolian princes traced their origin to Aeolus through several generations descending from his daughter Calyce. The Aetolian plays are the Oeneus, Meleager, and Hipponous. Among the sons of Aeolus were Sisyphus, Cretheus, Athamas, and Salmoneus. Here then belong the plays (a) Sisyphus, Iobates; (b) Athamas (first and second), Phrixus; and (c) Salmoneus, Tyro (first and second). Cretheus, the husband of Tyro, was also the father of Pheres and Aeson, so that we may add (d) the doubtful plays *Admetus*¹ and Eumelus; and (e) the series of plays containing various episodes of the Argonautic adventure: Lemniae, Amycus, Phineus (first and second), Tympanistae, Colchides, Scythae, and Rizotomi. The Argonautic saga comes next to the Trojan in variety and extent; but, though there are several allusions to the Argonauts and their adventures in Homer, and many more in Hesiod, none of the Hesiodic poems, unless it be the third book of the *κατάλογος*², appears to have contained a complete narrative of the voyage. Of later epics the Naupactia, and the Corinthiaca of Eumelus, clearly related to this subject.

¹ The τραγωδούμενα of Asclepiades of Tragilus was just such a handbook of tragic mythology. The fragments indicate that if it had been preserved it would have contributed little to our knowledge of the works of the tragedians.

² Rzsch in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 1213. Christ-Schmid, op. cit. p. 123, describe the κατάλογος as 'a versified text-book of heroic history.'

III. Issue of Inachus. In the play entitled Inachus Sophocles handled the intrigue of Zeus with Io, and the result of the jealousy of Hera. Epaphus, the son of Io born in Egypt, was the father of Belus and Agenor, who were the ancestors of the two stocks into which the Inachidae were subsequently divided. (a) Belus was the father of Danaus and Aegyptus, from whom was descended Acrisius through Lynceus, the son of Aegyptus, and Hypermnestra, the daughter of Danaus. Here then belong the plays containing the story of Perseus: Acrisius, Danae, Andromeda, Larissaei. The grandson of Perseus was Amphitryon, the putative father of Heracles. The Heracleian plays are Amphitryon, Heradiscus, Heracles (or ἐπὶ Ταυνάρῃ σάτυροι)³, and Trachiniae. The story of Danae and Perseus is undoubtedly old⁴, but we cannot identify any epic poem as the principal document from which the subsequent tradition started. The Danaïs, which has already been mentioned, seems to have contained the story of the Danaiids. The kernel of the story of Heracles and his labours is believed to have been contained

¹ See n. on fr. 851.

² Rzsch in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 1202, 1205 f.

³ The identification is by no means certain: see p. 167.

⁴ Hom. Ξ 319, Hes. Scut. 216.

in a Dorian epic which disappeared at a very early date and consequently exercised no direct influence on Attic tragedy¹. Aristotle's slighting reference² shows that the poems which existed in his time were not of much account. An exception should perhaps be made in favour of the Οἰχαλίας ἄλωσις, one of the chief sources of the Trachiniae, which was attributed to the Ionian Creophylus³. (b) Europa, the daughter of Agenor, became the mother of Minos, with whose story are connected the plays Daedalus, Camici, *Minos*⁴, and Polyidus (Μάντεις). Cadmus, the brother of Europa, whose journey in search of his sister brought him ultimately to Thebes, was the traditional ancestor of the Theban dynasty. The following plays are connected with the fortunes of his descendants: Dionysiscus, Niobe, Oedipus Tyrannus, Oedipus Coloneus, Amphiaraus, Antigone, Epigoni (or Eriphyle), Oecles, and Alcmaeon. The Theban epics have already been mentioned.

IV. Pelasgus, according to some the son of Zeus and Niobe, but by others reckoned as sprung from the soil, stands at the head of the Arcadian genealogies. The Arcadian plays are the Aleadae, Telephus, and Mysi.

V. Arcadia was also the scene of the Ichneutae, which however occupies a separate class in view of its relation to the fortunes of Maia, daughter of Atlas the Titan.

VI. The Asopids. We are here concerned with the adventures of the descendants of Aeacus, the grandson of Asopus. The Ἀχαιλέως ἐρασταί belongs here rather than to the Troica, but there is much doubt respecting the subjects of the Peleus, Phthioides, Dolopes, and Phoenix.

VII. Cecrops the earth-born was the earliest figure in the mythical sequence of the Athenian kings. The Attic legends were favourite subjects with Sophocles and Euripides, and here if anywhere they were indebted to local traditions at least as much as to literary models. No doubt the outlines of the chief stories had been fixed by previous writers, but we know scarcely

¹ Wilamowitz, Eur. Her. 2 1 69 f.

² poet. 8. 1451^a 20.

³ See Jebb's Trachiniae, p. xviii. In the previous pages (xv ff.) the literary history of the Heracles myth is discussed.

⁴ Perhaps an alternative title: see p. xviii.

anything about the Theseidis (EGF p. 217), and the Atthis of Hegesinus is attested by a solitary quotation of Pausanias (9. 29. 1). The plays in question are the Tereus, Procris, Creusa (Ion), Aegeus, Theseus, and Phaedra. The Oedipus Coloneus, which in form belongs to the Theban Cycle, is largely Attic in substance, and entirely in spirit.

VIII. The Tantalids. Here, as in the case of the Asopids, it is not possible strictly to separate the legends of the house of Atreus from the Trojan Cycle, but the Tantalus, Oenomaus (Hippodamia), Atreus, and Thyestes (first and second) clearly belong to the earlier period.

IX. Troica. Thanks to the evidence of Proclus, we are able to arrange the remaining plays under the titles of the epics which contain the Trojan cycle. (a) Κύπρια: *Alexander*¹, Eris, Crisis, Momus, 'Ελένης γάμος, 'Οδυσσεὺς μαινόμενος, 'Αχαιῶν σύλλογος, Iphigenia (Clytaemnestra), Σύνδειπνοι, Ποιμένες (Andromache), 'Ελένης ἀπαίτησις (ἀρπαγή), Troilus, Palamedes. (b) Αἰθιοπῆς: Aethiopes (Memnon), *Phryges*². (c) Ἰλιάς μικρά: Ajax, Philoctetes, Philoctetes at Troy, Scyrii, Eurypylus, Lacaenae. (d) Ἰλίου πέρις: Laocoön, Sinon, Priamus, Antenoridae, Locrian Ajax, Αἰχμαλωτίδες, Polyxena. (e) Νόστοι: Ναύπλιος καταπλέων, Ναύπλιος πυρκαεὺς, Aegisthus, Electra, Aletes, Erigone, Chryses, Hermione, Tyndareus, Teucer, Eurysaces. (f) 'Οδυσσεΐα: Nausicaa, Phaeaces. (g) Τηλεγονία: Euryalus, 'Οδυσσεὺς ἀκανθοπλήξ.

The subjects of the following plays are entirely unknown: Ἰβηρες, Κωφοί, Μούσαι, Ἵβρις, Ἵδροφόροι.

If the number 112 is accepted as a probable total of the plays comprised in the preceding list, it will be noticed that 43 of them, or over 38 per cent., belong to the Trojan Cycle. A similar calculation applied to the plays of Aeschylus and Euripides yields percentages of 23 and 21 respectively. These remarkable figures entirely confirm the evidence relating to Sophocles' Homeric proclivities; and if the limits were enlarged so as to include the plays whose subjects lie on the borders of the Homeric domain, the result would be even more striking. Want of information concerning the character and extent of the ἐπικὸς κύκλος prevents a closer enquiry.

¹ This play should in strictness have been associated with class V: cf. Apollod. 3. 150. But it would be inconvenient to separate it from the other Trojan plays.

² The subject of the play is extremely doubtful: see II p. 325.

§ 3. The tradition of the text.

Tradition of the extant
plays.

The seven plays which still survive have been handed down to us in a number of MSS ranging from the eleventh to the sixteenth century, of which the oldest and best is the well-known Laurentian, written in the first half of the eleventh century. But, whereas twelve MSS contain all the seven plays, either complete or with lacunae, and fifteen others four or more but less than seven, no less than seventy are restricted to the Ajax, Electra, and Oedipus Tyrannus alone, or to one or two of them¹. The preponderance of the three plays is readily explained by their exclusive use for educational purposes during the Byzantine period. The existence of this selection may perhaps be traced as far back as to 500 A.D., if we may judge from the title of a treatise written by Eugenius, head of the imperial school at Constantinople under Anastasius I (491—518) and predecessor of Stephen of Byzantium in the tenure of that office². The work was entitled *κωλομετρία τῶν μελικῶν Αἰσχύλου Σοφοκλέους καὶ Εὐριπίδου ἀπὸ δραμάτων ιε'*³. That is to say, Eugenius, no doubt following earlier scholars, published analyses of the lyrical parts of the three tragedians similar to those which Heliodorus constructed for Aristophanes, but limited his activity to fifteen plays, three of Aeschylus, three of Sophocles, and nine of Euripides⁴. The number chosen corresponds to that of the plays selected from Aeschylus (Prometheus, Seven, and Persae), as well as of those taken later from Euripides (Hecuba, Orestes, and Phoenissae); and each of these groups consists of the first three plays according to the order of an earlier and larger collection. The history of the Euripidean tradition is more complicated, and does not concern us here, but the earlier collections made from

¹ The figures are taken from Jebb's text-edition of Sophocles, p. XIII f.

² Steph. Byz. p. 93, 1.

³ Suid. s.v. Εὐγένιος.

⁴ So Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa VI 987; Christ-Schmid, op. cit. II⁵ p. 879; Sandys, Hist. Cl. Schol. I 402; and C. H. Moore in C.R. XIX 12. Wilamowitz, Einleitung, p. 197¹³², thinks the statement obscure.

the works of Aeschylus and Sophocles undoubtedly comprised the fourteen plays which still exist. It must be recognized therefore that the survival of particular plays is due not to the accidental preservation of this or that MS from which all other copies were derived, but rather to the educational needs which prompted scholars to prepare annotated editions of select plays for the use of schools. Of the circumstances attending the publication of the earlier collection hardly a trace remains. An Argument is attached to each of the two plays Oedipus Coloneus and Antigone bearing the name of a certain Sallustius, and in the former he is described as Sallustius Pythagoras. In all probability therefore there was a tradition identifying him with Sallustius the Pythagorean¹, the follower of Iamblichus and author of the treatise *περὶ θεῶν καὶ κόσμου*², who belonged to the latter part of the fourth century. This writer is probably the same man as the friend of the emperor Julian, and has also been identified with the sophist Sallustius to whom Suidas ascribes commentaries on Demosthenes and Herodotus³. Now, if Sallustius, the editor of the select plays, lived at so late a date as the second half of the fourth century, it is unlikely that he was the first compiler of the selection⁴. It will be shown later that the direct quotation of tragedies other than those contained in the select edition died out at the end of the second century. Further, it may be inferred, from the precise correspondence in subject between the plays chosen from each of the three great tragedians which contain the stories of Oedipus and Orestes, that the whole selection was made by a single person. Beyond this it is impossible to determine either author or date. Wilamo-

¹ The title of the Argument is given in L as σαλουστίου τῷ πυθαγόρου. Dindorf conjectured that πυθαγόρου was the blunder of someone who did not perceive that the abbreviation represented ἐπιθέσεις, but the view of Wilamowitz as stated above is preferable. F. Cumont, Rev. de Philol. xvi 53, rejecting the identification, points out that Sallustius was a Neo-Platonist.

² For this work and its author see Gilbert Murray, Four Stages of Greek Religion, p. 163 ff.

³ A grammarian Sallust is quoted in schol. Ar. Plut. 725. Cumont assigns him to the sixth century.

⁴ Wilamowitz, op. cit. p. 199. Pius, a commentator on Sophocles, who is assigned to the second century (Christ-Schmid, op. cit. p. 345), is mentioned in schol. Al. 408.

witz, who has once for all laid down the conditions of the problem, arrived at the conclusion that the selection was first made in the age of Plutarch, and after the lapse of a century secured universal acceptance¹.

We shall now proceed to give some account of the Sophoclean tradition in antiquity in order to prepare the way for an examination of the sources from which our knowledge of the lost plays is derived. The existence of written copies of Attic tragedies can be traced back to the period of their production, that is to say, to a date not later than the close of the fifth century B.C., as is proved by the well-known passage in Ar. Ran. 52 where Dionysus speaks of reading to himself the Andromeda of Euripides; and the force of v. 1114 of the same play is very much impaired if we do not understand it as implying that the text of the tragedians was studied in literary circles. The learning by heart of tragic ῥήσεις is mentioned by Plato², and Alexis includes tragedies in a list of books which are recommended for the improvement of Heracles, who however chooses a cookery-book in preference to all of them³. The earliest recognition of the necessity for maintaining the integrity of the tragic texts is to be found in the law of Lycurgus the orator, which required that an official copy of the plays of Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides should be preserved in the archives, and that in future performances the actors should adhere to the text of this copy⁴. It has been suggested that the official text only contained such plays as still kept the stage in the fourth century, but, as the plays of Aeschylus were seldom reproduced at that time⁵, it was probably more comprehensive. In fact, if such an official copy was ever made, although its primary purpose was not so much directly critical as to check the licence of the actors, it may be presumed that the net was cast as wide as possible, and that the most authoritative sources were consulted⁶. It is

Athens to Alexandria.

¹ Wilamowitz, op. cit. p. 202.

² legg. 811 A: cf. Herond. 3. 30.

³ fr. 135, II 345 K.

⁴ Plut. vit. X orat. p. 841 F. The documents were no doubt preserved in the Metroum (Frazer's Pausanias, II p. 68).

⁵ Haigh, *Attic Theatre*³, p. 76.

⁶ Wilamowitz, op. cit. p. 131, hardly allows so much. But his view that the generally supposed that this was the copy subsequently borrowed by Ptolemy Euergetes, when he left a deposit of fifteen talents as security for its return. His professed object was to make a transcript for his own use; but, when this had been done, he sent back the transcript to Athens in place of the original, and the Athenians were obliged to content themselves with a forfeit of the deposit¹. It may be open to doubt whether the reference is to Euergetes I (247—221 B.C.) or to Euergetes II Physcon (146—117 B.C.)², although the former is generally preferred; but the historical truth of the story is of less importance than the inferences to which it leads. Thus the acquisition of the official copy was certainly not regarded as having settled the text of the tragedians, for otherwise the conjectures of Aristophanes would not have been recorded in our scholia. A still more important fact to which the story testifies is the migration of tragedy in the third century from Athens to Alexandria³, both as the home of the Alexandrian Pleiad, and as the place where the study of the old tragedians was pursued with the greatest zeal. It is to Alexandria that we owe our existing texts, and almost the whole of the information that can be recovered concerning the lost plays.

Aesthetic and historical criticism of the tragedians had been pursued almost exclusively by the Peripatetics in pre-Alexandrian times. With the former we are not immediately concerned, but on the historical side the publication of Aristotle's διδασκαλῆαι was of considerable importance. This work was a collection of extracts from the archives giving the dates and circumstances of production of all the tragedies and comedies recorded in the official lists. The particulars which the archon registered were the names of the competing poets and their plays, of the choregi, and of the leading actors, and the order in which the competitors were placed by the judges. The concluding sentences of the ordinance was probably ineffective is to be preferred to Rutherford's contention that the story is inconsistent with the references to actors' readings in the scholia to Euripides (Annotation, pp. 57-60).

¹ Galen in Hippocr. epidem. III 2 (XVII 1. 607 K.).

² Sandys, History of Classical Scholarship, I p. 58. The later date is advocated by Usener in Susseml, op. cit. II 667, but see ibid. p. 682.

³ Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 439 ff.

Argument to the Agamemnon of Aeschylus had been recognized as a fragment of Aristotle's treatise¹, and a remarkable confirmation of the accuracy of our tradition came to light in 1886, when an inscription was discovered on the Acropolis, recording the production of the Oresteia, and agreeing exactly in the facts which it mentions with the text of the Medicean MS². But the stone-inscription was not the original record; for, so far as the contests listed were earlier than Aristotle's time, the details to be inscribed were taken from his book or were otherwise due to his researches³. Aristotle also wrote a treatise in one book entitled περὶ τραγωδιῶν, and another also in one book entitled *νῆκαι Διονυσιακαί*⁴. Of the former nothing whatever is known, and there is no probability in Mueller's view⁵ that it was related to the διδασκαλῆαι as a part to the whole or vice versa. We are equally in the dark regarding the νῆκαι Διονυσιακαί, but it is a plausible conjecture that it contained lists of winners in the various contests at the Dionysia, the existence of which, beside the more elaborate records relating to tragedy and comedy alone, is proved by inscriptions⁶. Dicaearchus of Messene (c. 310 B.C.) displayed no less interest than his master in the province of dramatic criticism. His work ὑποθέσεις τῶν Εὐριπίδου καὶ Σοφοκλέους μύθων was an investigation into the subject-matter of the plots of the various plays of Euripides and Sophocles, and especially into the sources from which they were derived, the extent of their deviations from the traditional versions, and the reasons which prompted such individual treatment⁷. Traces of the handiwork of Dicaearchus are to be seen in the first of the existing Arguments to the Alcestis and the Rhesus. Another of his works,

¹ fr. 618 Rose.

² CIA IV 971; first published in Ἐφημερίς Ἀρχαιολογική, 1886, p. 267. The inscription belongs to the class of victors' lists and is therefore not to be connected with the διδασκαλῆαι.

³ Wilhelm, Urkunden dramatischer Aufführungen in Athen, pp. 13—15.

⁴ Diog. L. 5. 26.

⁵ FHG II 182.

⁶ CIA II 971 as contrasted with 972, 973, 975. See further Haigh, *Attic Theatre*³, p. 47; Reisch in Pauly-Wissowa v 398.

⁷ FHG II 247.

⁸ The result was established by H. Schrader, quaest. Peripateticae, Hamburg, 1884. The work of Dicaearchus was more scientific than the τραγωιδούμενα of Asclepiades, the character of which has already been explained (p. xxviii).

the Διονυσιακοὶ ἀγῶνες, probably a subdivision of the more comprehensive title περὶ μουσικῶν ἀγώνων, contained various items of information relating to the history of the Attic stage. Of less account is Hieronymus of Rhodes (c. 290—230 B.C.), another Peripatetic, who is quoted once or twice by Athenaeus as the source of certain anecdotes relating to Sophocles¹, and may be compared with Dicaearchus as having been responsible for the statement that the plot of Euripides' Phoenix was drawn from the annals of a village community².

Passing to Alexandria, we find that at an early date (c. 285 B.C.) Zenodotus, the first librarian, shared with Lycophron and Alexander Aetolus the task of putting in order the books in the library, and that to Alexander was assigned the special duty of superintending the arrangement of the tragedies and satyr-plays³. Callimachus, who succeeded Zenodotus, completed the catalogue which his predecessor had begun and published it in 120 books under the title πίνακες τῶν ἐν πάσῃ παιδείᾳ διαλαμψάντων καὶ ὧν ξυνέγραψαν. This celebrated work was more than a catalogue, since it contained biographical and other details of literary history, and, in the case of the dramatic writers, notices drawn from Aristotle's διδασκαλίας⁴ relating to the production of their plays at the Dionysia. Eratosthenes (c. 245 B.C.) confined his studies in the Attic drama to the production of a work on comedy (περὶ ἀρχαίας κωμωδίας), but Aristophanes of Byzantium, who became chief librarian on the death of Eratosthenes (195 B.C.), was the first critic who laboured continuously on the text of the tragedians, and by his investigations laid a secure foundation for the benefit of later generations. We have already had occasion to refer to his work πρὸς τοὺς Καλλιμάχου πίνακας, which seems to have contained corrections of and additions to the treatise of Callimachus⁵. But his influence in the sphere of textual criticism was of much greater importance. There is no doubt whatever that he edited Euripides, for the allusions to him in the scholia do not admit of any other ex-

Alex-
andrian studies.

¹ FHG II 450 n. See also vit. Soph. vi. His book was entitled περὶ ποιητῶν.

² TGF p. 621.

³ Knaack in Pauly-Wissowa I 1447.

⁴ Schol. Ar. Nub. 552. For the whole subject see O. Schneider, Callimachea, II 297 ff.

⁵ Athen. 408 F.

planation. There is no similar evidence to prove that he was also responsible for editions of Aeschylus and Sophocles; but, since no other assumption accounts equally well for the existence of the ὑποθέσεις attributed to him which are attached to plays of all three tragedians¹, recent scholars have been unanimous in so concluding². It may be added that the discovery of the Ichneutae papyrus, with marginal variants attributed to Aristophanes³, makes strongly in the same direction. Wilamowitz argued that the ὑποθέσεις were not accompanied by a commentary on the text, and that the edition of Aristophanes was intended rather for the general reader than for scholars⁴. However this may be, there is evidence that he wrote a ὑπόμνημα—or what we should call 'lecture-notes'—on the Orestes, as well as on other plays⁵; and much of the aesthetic criticism which is found in the scholia to Sophocles and Euripides has been attributed to him. We must not forget his lexicographical studies, plentiful remains of which are to be found in Eustathius, and less patently in Hesychius, Pollux, and Athenaeus, not to mention the excerpts still existing in medieval MSS which have been published by Boissonade and E. Miller⁶. These studies were entitled *λέξεις*⁷ or γλῶσσαι, and were divided into two main classes: (1) collections of dialectical variants, (2) varieties of subject-matter (e.g. περὶ ὀνομασίας ἡλικιῶν, περὶ συγγενικῶν ὀνομάτων). It was probably in this work that Aristophanes explained ἐμασχαλίσθη in El. 445⁸; unless the reference should ¹ His name appears at the head of a ὑπόθεσις to the Antigone, and there are good reasons for referring to him also the anonymous Arguments to the O. C., El., and Phil., or at any rate parts of them.

² Wilamowitz, p. 145; Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa II 998; Susemihl, I 442; Sandys, p. 128 f.

³ His name appears in schol. Ichn. 73, 137, 140, 215.

⁴ This conclusion is based chiefly on the fact that those plays of Euripides which have no scholia (e.g. the Suppliants) nevertheless show traces of the learning of Aristophanes.

⁵ Wilamowitz, p. 151 ff.

⁶ Boissonade, Herod. Epim. p. 283; Miller, Mélanges de lit. gr. p. 427 ff. The best account of Aristophanes' lexicography is by L. Cohn in Jahrb. f. cl. Philol. Suppl. XII 285—374.

⁷ Schol. Eur. Phoen. 684.

⁸ Suid. Phot. s.v. μασχαλίσματα. See on fr. 623.

be taken to indicate that he published a ὑπόμνημα on the *Electra*¹. Callistratus, a pupil of Aristophanes, followed up his master's researches in the dramatic sphere, and, although his name is better known from its frequent occurrence in the scholia to Aristophanes and Euripides, there is evidence that he also wrote commentaries on Sophocles². Aristarchus (216—144 B.C.), the most renowned of all the Alexandrian critics, was a fellow-pupil and rival of Callistratus. The fame of his labours on Homer has thrown into the shade his work on other poets; but Dionysius Thrax³ testifies that his familiarity with the tragic texts was so great that he was able freely to recite them from memory. We meet with his name here and there as a witness for a particular fragment⁴, and fr. 449 and schol. El. 6 (Hesych. s.v. λυκοκτόνου θεοῦ) are sufficient to prove his interest in the interpretation of the text. Nevertheless, as compared with that of Aristophanes, his influence upon the course of subsequent research was slight. With Aristarchus should be named his chief opponent Crates of Mallus, the most distinguished representative of the Pergamene school, who wrote upon Aristophanes and Euripides, but is not proved by extant quotations to have given special attention to Sophocles⁵.

We have now reached a period in which the political supremacy of Rome began to exercise an attraction upon the intellectual activities of the Hellenistic world. At the time when Aristarchus was acknowledged to have reached the fullness of his critical powers the glories of the kingdoms of Ptolemy, Attalus, and Seleucus had passed. Hitherto in Italy, although there was a considerable amount of colloquial familiarity with the Greek speech, the cultivation of Greek letters had been confined to a limited circle. Ennius (239—169 B.C.), who was half a Greek by birth, and earned his living by his skill as a teacher and writer, came forward as a propagandist of Hellenism, with the support of Publius Scipio and other leading nobles.

Roman period.

¹ But it is hardly to be supposed that he was the author of the anonymous ὑπόμνημα quoted by schol. L on 451, 488.

² Schol. cod. Barocc. Ad. 283. R. Schmidt, de Callistrato, p. 324.

³ Etym. M. p. 277, 55.

⁴ frs. 449, 624, 728.

⁵ Hecker introduced his name by emendation in schol. O. C. 100.

His tragedies were for the most part adaptations of Euripides, and he was followed by Pacuvius (219—129) and Accius (170—105), who constructed their plays with greater skill and included Sophocles among their models. Unfortunately the fragments of these writers are so scanty that they are very seldom of service in the reconstruction of the Greek originals¹. The Romans were thus familiarized through the stage with the form and contents of Greek tragedy before they were trained to study them as literature. But after 146 B.C. the assimilation of Greek culture spread rapidly. That which was at first the exclusive possession of the Scipionic circle became in the next generation the common heritage of every educated Roman. The ever-increasing demand for instruction brought the learning of Pergamum and Alexandria into contact with the ruling class of the imperial city. Educational requirements not only gave an enormous stimulus to the multiplication of copies of the most famous Greek authors, but grammar and criticism themselves were internationalized. Alexandria ceased to be the home of the most learned professors, and gradually lost its supremacy in the world of letters, although, as the birth-place of Didymus, Herodian, Harpocration, and many others, it continued for three centuries to preserve its reputation as the ultimate source of philological erudition. It is not surprising, in view of these circumstances, that the name of Didymus, who, after the lapse of more than a century, comes next on the list of Sophoclean editors, should be associated with a change in method calculated to adapt his lucubrations to the requirements of the Roman world.

Didymus. Didymus is the most important name in our survey, not so much in consequence of his individual merit, although this has perhaps been undeservedly belittled, as because we owe to him more than to any other single person the preservation of such fragmentary knowledge as we possess respecting the lost plays of the Greek tragedians. The extraordinary industry of Didymus, which earned for him the epithet χαλκέντερος, may be estimated by his performance in the field of literary criticism alone, in which he undertook the interpretation of Homer, Hesiod, Pindar and Bacchylides, the tragedians, Aristophanes and other comic poets, and the Attic orators. The importance of his collections to modern research becomes apparent when we learn that large portions of the existing scholia to Pindar, Euripides, and Aristophanes are drawn from the commentaries of Didymus, and that his writings are the ultimate source of the scholia to Sophocles. It is significant that in these, while the names of the older Alexandrian grammarians are scarcely mentioned or else are replaced by such general descriptions as 'the commentators', that of Didymus occurs at least nine times². These commentaries were not simply ὑπομνήματα in the sense previously indicated, but were accompanied by a text³. The older grammarians had lectured to their pupils from a plain text, but conditions were now very different, and the wider public for whom the editions of Didymus were intended could not dispense with explanatory notes. The function of Didymus should not be misconceived. He was neither an original thinker nor an independent investigator: his province was to collect the results garnered by earlier scholars, and to make them serviceable to the needs of his contemporaries and his successors. It has been inferred that these books were the prototypes of the class afterwards represented by the medieval MSS, in which the margins surrounding the text are occupied with exegetical comment and critical variants⁴. Recent discoveries of papyri, which have been sufficiently numerous to familiarize us with the form and aspect of the papyrus roll, have only partially confirmed this conclusion. It is true that critical and explanatory notes are found in them,

¹ The leading authority on the plots of the Roman tragedians is O. Ribbeck, die Römische Tragödie, Leipzig, 1875.

¹ See Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa v 452. There is a good instance in schol. Ant. 45, which shows that they were anterior to Didymus.

² For Didymus as an interpreter of Sophocles see also fr. 718. Etym. Gud. p. 81, 37 (Trach. 1054) is to be added to the passages in which Didymus is referred to by name.

³ This is proved by schol. O. C. 237, Al. 1225. The account given above follows Wilamowitz, p. 166. He finds in the scholia to the O. C., besides the work of Didymus, traces of a ὑπόμνημα devoted chiefly to the explanation of antiquarian and mythological details. Cohn, however, is inclined to refer this part also to Didymus.

⁴ Wilamowitz, l.c. The same opinion is maintained in Die griech. Literatur des Altertums in Kultur d. Gegenwart, I viii² (1907) p. 96. See also Susemihl, II 201.

and particularly in the Paris fragments of the Partheneion of Alcman, which are ascribed to the first century A.D., and the Oxyrhynchus papyrus of the Paean of Pindar, which belongs to the early part of the second. But they are very scantily represented in the Hypsipyle and Ichneutae papyri, and there are obvious reasons why a continuous commentary was less suitable for inclusion in the papyrus roll than in the parchment book of a later age. It follows that the existing scholia, although in substance based upon the results of Alexandrian learning, are not formally and directly the completion of an original Alexandrian nucleus¹. The growth of the various collections cannot be traced in detail, since for the most part the secure support of names and dates is wanting². A glance at Nauck's Index of Sources will show that many of the fragments are quoted in the scholia to the writers enumerated above, but a still greater number is derived from the lexicographical labours of Didymus. The prefatory letter to Eulogius, which Hesychius placed in the forefront of his lexicon, refers to the separate vocabularies of comic and tragic diction (λέξεις) which Theon and Didymus had composed. According to recent critics³, the meaning is not that Theon was the author responsible for a κωμικὴ λέξις and Didymus for a τραγικὴ λέξις, but that each of them made a collection of the idioms and phraseology of both branches. The scope of Theon's activity is obscure in the absence of further information, but we shall presently return to him. So far as Didymus is concerned, there is ample evidence elsewhere to confirm the statement of the letter that he published a κωμικὴ λέξις as well as a τραγικὴ λέξις. The τραγικὴ λέξις was arranged according to the alphabetical order of the words, and divided into books, of which Harpocration quotes the twenty-eighth⁴. Further, it should be noted that the lexicon was closely connected with the separately published commentaries to the tragic poets. It is a natural assumption that it contained a series

¹ The issue involved is fully discussed with the result explained above by J. Williams White in his Scholia on the Aves of Aristophanes, pp. liii—lxiv.

² The position of Sallustius in regard to Sophocles has already been mentioned (p. xxxiii).

³ Cohn, l.c. 461.

⁴ p. 134, 2, s.v. ξηραλοιφεῖν (Soph. fr. 494).

of lexicographical excerpts from the commentaries, and the identity of treatment is proved by examples of the same matter expressed in the same words by the lexicographers, who used only the λέξεις, and the scholia, which derive from the commentaries of Didymus¹. Of course the lexicographical notes of Didymus were largely a compilation from the λέξεις of Aristophanes, from the Ἀττικάι λέξεις of Crates of Mallus, and other authorities too numerous to mention. But the τραγικὴ λέξις, in its turn, became a treasure-house for successive plunderers to rifle. A lexicon, as Wilamowitz remarks², soon ceases to be left intact, as befits a private possession: each succeeding generation reconstructs, abbreviates, or enlarges, according to its needs. Pamphilus of Alexandria, who belonged Pamphilus. to the middle of the first century A.D., and was the last of the Aristarcheans, incorporated the τραγικὴ λέξις in his encyclopaedic treatise entitled λειμών or περὶ γλωσσῶν καὶ ὀνομάτων in ninety-five books. His object was to collect and enlarge the departmental labours of his predecessors in their various provinces. The first part of the work (περὶ γλωσσῶν) contained the lexicons devoted to particular authors, branches of literature, and dialects³; and the second (περὶ ὀνομάτων) was divided according to varieties of subject-matter (cooking, shipbuilding, and so forth). In the reign of Hadrian appeared an epitome (Ἑλληνικὰ ὀνόματα) by Julius Vestinus, probably in thirty books⁴. But for practical purposes even this reduction in bulk was insufficient. Shortly afterwards Diogenian, a native of Diogenian. Heraclea in Pontus, produced another epitome in five books under the title λέξις παντοδαπή. He reduced the whole collection to alphabetical order and is the first author of a general lexicon which had the benefit of this arrangement⁵. The desired result was effected by the removal of most of the quotations,

¹ For examples see the sources quoted for frs. 11, 36, 42, 59, 272, 425, 511, 619, 673, 885. Of course it is not pretended that strict proof is possible in each case.

² p. 164.

³ Hence Ἀττικάι λέξεις in Athen. 494 F.

⁴ According to the emendation of Naber (Phot. prol. p. 30), who gives X for δ' in Suid. s.v. Ὀδησίππος.

⁵ Reitzenstein in Rh. Mus. XLIII 456 ff. In this article the author divides the history of lexicography from the Alexandrians to Suidas into four periods. Pamphilus ends the first, Diogenian belongs to the second, and Hesychius to the third.

and by a severe restriction of the explanatory material. The work of Diogenian, notwithstanding these deficiencies, proved adequate for its purpose. It was widely used as a handbook of reference so long as the classical authors continued to be read, and its existence can be traced in the Byzantine period down to the twelfth century¹. So completely was Pamphilus superseded by the epitomator that Athenaeus and Herodian are almost the only writers who made use of the fuller collection. For us the παντοδαπή λέξις of Diogenian is especially of interest as the Hesychius. source from which Hesychius drew most of his material; for the weight of authority inclines strongly in favour of the identification with it of the περιεργασμένοι which Hesychius ascribes to Diogenian in the prefatory letter². Thus Hesychius is the chief extant authority through which we can pass back to the τραγικὴ λέξις of Didymus, but the extent of the loss incurred in the epitomizing process can only be judged by the rare instances where a complete fragment of Didymus has been preserved³. Reference has already been made to the statement

Theon. of Hesychius that Theon as well as Didymus was the author of lexicons to the tragic and comic poets. The conjecture of Naber that Theon was the compiler, and that he put them together from the material scattered throughout the commentaries of Didymus, fails to account for the explicit references to the lexicons of Didymus. But Theon is of importance for other reasons. His services to Alexandrian literature were similar to those rendered by Didymus to the earlier poets: he is mentioned in the subscriptio as one of the sources for the existing scholia to Apollonius; and it is sufficiently established that he devoted considerable attention to the elucidation of Theocritus, Callimachus, and Lycophron, and published annotated editions of their poems⁴. Nevertheless, it has come as a surprise to find his name several times mentioned in the margin of the Ichneutae

¹ Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa v 781.

² Objections to the identification are stated by H. Schultz in Pauly-Wissowa viii 1310. The strange title περιεργασμένοι is explained as 'the book for poor pedants.'

³ e.g. the note on Achelous in Macrob. 5. 18.

⁴ Phot. lex. i p. 9.

⁵ Wilamowitz, Textgesch. d. gr. Bukol. p. 110; Schneider, Callim. ii 37.

papyrus as authority for a variant adopted in his edition¹. For there is no other evidence except the statement already quoted from Hesychius to connect Theon with the tragic poets², and the character of his edition and its relation to Didymus are equally obscure. It should be added that another grammarian, whose name may have been Nicanor, is quoted in the same papyrus but cannot be identified³.

After the time of Didymus and Theon there is no further record of editions of the tragedians. In fact, after the lapse of a century, the need for such comprehensive studies in this branch of literature was rapidly disappearing. The age of Hadrian, so often celebrated as an era of renaissance in literary taste, was actually that in which the causes of ultimate decay begin to be visible. The days of creative genius were past. Literature had become self-conscious, and every literary aspirant, instead of seeking to express his own thoughts in his own way, made it his prime object to fashion his style according to the recognized classical models. Rhetorical sophistic, of which Aelius Aristides and the Philostrati are the most characteristic representatives, flourished exceedingly throughout the reigns of the Antonines. The vices of this literature were its artificiality, affectation, and excessive elaboration; its indifference to reality, and its hollowness; and its entire sacrifice of matter to form. Quintilian's maxim pectus est quod disertos facit was forgotten; and the researches of the Atticists from Aelius Dionysius to Phrynichus were directed primarily to the practical end of assisting the art of public speaking⁴. The last thing they had in view was a scientific study of the Attic dialect; and, besides the Attic orators, only those authors were cultivated whose vocabulary was adapted to rhetorical requirements. In these conditions, tragedy and lyric poetry were the first to suffer,—not that Sophocles and Pindar were dethroned from their high place, but second century

The
A.D.

¹ Theon is, of course, a common name, so that some other critic than the son of Astemidorus may be intended.

² The references to his studies on Pindar are also rare: see schol. Pind. Ol. 5. 42, Paeon. 2. 37.

³ p. 224.

⁴ 'Die grammatische arbeit des 2. jahrhunderts ist im grunde nichts als σοφιστική προπαρσκευή': Wilamowitz, p. 176.

in a busy world they must submit to exercise their sway chiefly within the walls of the school-room. Hence arose the need for a selection, since the schoolmaster does not claim to be a scientific investigator who requires constant access to the whole of his material. There is thus good reason for the conclusion adopted by Wilamowitz that the selection of seven plays came into being during the course of the second century, although the name of the selector has not been recorded. It does not of course follow that the appearance of the selection led at once to the loss of the remaining plays. Copies of them were preserved in the public libraries, which might still have been consulted by professional students. We know also that the multiplication of transcripts on papyrus rolls still continued in Egypt¹, and no doubt elsewhere, so that readers must still have been forthcoming in certain circles. But, as demonstrating the loss of their influence on general culture, the subsequent absence of direct quotation is decisive.

§ 4. The Sources of the Fragments.

Now that we have followed the course of the tradition by which the plays of Sophocles were transmitted through Alexandria to the Roman and Byzantine eras, we are in a better position to examine the character of the documents in which the surviving fragments are preserved. These may be classified according to their origin as follows: (1) fragments of Sophoclean papyri; (2) direct quotations; and (3) indirect quotations. The third class, which is by far the most numerous, includes every case in which the author of the extant source owes his information not directly to Sophocles, but to some intermediate writer.

Papyrus
fragments.

The papyrus fragments are very few in number, and, except those belonging to the Eurypylus and Ichneutae, not of much intrinsic importance. Still, the lines recovered from the Ἀχαιῶν σύλλογος have settled the vexed question relating to the plot of that play¹; the scanty relics of the Niobe have some bearing on Sophocles' handling of the story²; and the fragments provisionally assigned to the Tantalus in this edition, if they are the work of Sophocles at all, raise a question of considerable interest³. All these, except the Niobe fragments, which are attributed to the third century B.C., are believed to have been written in the second century A.D., so that their date is entirely consistent with the conclusion reached in the last section⁴.

¹ See below. The parchment fragment of the Melanippe of Euripides (fr. 495) is now assigned to the fifth century: but that is an exceptional case. To the same effect Wilamowitz, Sappho u. Simonides, p. 288.

It is a more difficult matter to decide which are the latest direct quotations from the lost plays, because we cannot always be certain whether a reference which purports to come direct from Sophocles has not in fact been borrowed from an earlier authority whose existence is not acknowledged in the source. To take a capital instance, no one now believes that the swarms of quotations with which Clement of Alexandria fills certain portions of his writings were due to his immediate acquaintance with the text of the authors cited. We shall subsequently explain how he came by them.

The sources which beyond all dispute show a first-hand acquaintance with the text of Sophocles are a small proportion of the total. Of those which are altogether or almost contemporary the most numerous and important are the plays of the comic poets. Aristophanes refers to the Niobe by name and to the Tereus and Tyro in unmistakable terms⁵; and at least sixteen other allusions to or parodies of the Sophoclean text are warranted by the evidence of the scholia⁶. It is curious that five of them belong to the Peleus, a play not otherwise much quoted; and one of the same group is further echoed by a comic writer, who may have been Aristophanes himself, and was at any rate his contemporary⁷. The Old Comedy is also represented by single quotations of Philonides, Eupolis, and Phrynichus⁸, and

¹ 1 p. 94 ff.

² 11 p. 96 f.

³ 11 pp. 97 f., 209 ff.

⁴ The papyrus of the Hypsipyle (Oxyrh. Pap. no. 852) is considered to be not much, if at all, anterior to 200 A.D.

⁵ Ar. Vesp. 579, Av. 100, Lys. 138.

⁶ frs. 178, 275, 371, 469, 476, 487, 489, 490, 491, 493, 578, 654, 668, 683 (doubtful), 710, 727, 890.

⁷ See n. on fr. 487.

⁸ frs. 491, 811, 890.

the Middle by an interesting parody of Antiphanes¹. At a later date Menander copied a famous trimeter which was in everyone's mouth²; and another imitation of the same line appears in the collection of monosticha which passes by the same writer's name. This miscellany, which was not put together until Roman times, while containing much that Menander certainly did not write, includes a number of lines which appear to follow the tracks of Sophocles. Here or there may be an instance where Menander deliberately repeated a tragic verse; but most of them, whether transmitted through his agency or that of others, had become current as publica materies, having long ceased to be recognized as subject to the private dominion of Sophocles³.

We pass to the prose-writers of the fourth century. Two allusions to Sophoclean fragments have been traced in the dialogues of Plato, but neither is free from doubt⁴. On the other hand, by a curious error, which he shared with Aristophanes and Antisthenes, he attributed to Euripides a line which certainly belonged to the *Locrian Ajax*⁵. Demosthenes in a well-known passage mentions the appearance of Aeschines in the title-rôle of the Oenomaus. Aristotle in the poetics refers to the Eurypylos, Lacaenae, Niptra, Peleus, Phthiotides, Tereus, and Tyro, and perhaps to the Polyxena; while in the rhetoric he cites the Σύνδεσμοι, Teucer, and *Tyro*⁶. Reasons have also been given for supposing that he has wrongly ascribed to Aeschylus a fragment of considerable length which actually came from the *Tereus*⁷. The plot of the Aleadae was detected by means of indications afforded in the Odysseus attributed to Alcidas.

¹ fr. 754.

² fr. 319. It should be added that the alleged quotations by Aristophon (fr. 198), Alexis (fr. 895), and Philemon (fr. 918), are extremely doubtful.

³ Similarly the Greek original which no doubt lies at the back of Plaut. Stich. 522 cannot be proved to have been imitated from fr. 88, 1.

⁴ frs. 256, 662.

⁵ See n. on fr. 14. Attention should have been directed to the significant statement in the Aristophanic scholia, that the play of Euripides in which the words occurred was not preserved.

⁶ Here, and generally throughout the present section, the reader is referred to Nauck's Index of Sources for the verification of statements not otherwise vouched.

⁷ See on fr. 581.

This work is a sophistic exercise of uncertain date; but, even if not composed within the limits of the fourth century, it cannot be placed much later¹.

There is not much to be said of the literature of the following centuries until we reach the Roman age, since the learning of Alexandria is known to us almost entirely at second hand. An exception should perhaps be made in favour of the καταστερισμοί of Eratosthenes, in which the various constellations are enumerated in connexion with a series of poetical legends. The epitome which has come down to us is a miserably distorted copy of its original, but the trend of recent criticism favours the view that some such treatise was actually written by Eratosthenes, and that a residuum of his learning is to be found in the existing text². In that case the information respecting the plot of the *Andromeda*³ comes direct from a handbook of the third century B.C. The fragments of a description of Greece wrongly attributed to Dicaearchus yield a single quotation from Sophocles⁴. These interesting extracts have now been identified as the work of Heracleides ὁ κριτικός, whose name has been recovered from a quotation by Apollonius, the collector of *παράδοξα*⁵. Nothing further is known of the author, and the composition of his book has been variously dated between the limits 289—171 B.C.⁶ Polybius, who makes a vague allusion to the *Antenoridae*⁷, stands on the threshold of the Roman epoch.

In an examination of the Greek and Roman literature of the two centuries which respectively precede and follow the opening of the Christian era, there is no longer a presumption in favour of the immediate derivation of a quotation from its source. Literary production had become a well-organized profession with specialized branches. There was a vigorous demand for handbooks of all kinds, in the interest of a cosmopolitan culture thereby the more easily attained. Philosophy, science, and the

¹ Blass, Attische Beredsamkeit, II² p. 363.

² A summary of the controversy is given by Knaack in his article on Eratosthenes in Pauly-Wissowa VI 377 ff.

³ I p. 78.

⁴ fr. 773.

⁵ hist. mir. 19 (Westermann, p. 109).

⁶ See Daebritz in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 484 ff., and W. H. Duke in Essays presented to Ridgway, p. 228 ff.

⁷ I p. 88.

art of rhetoric must be distilled to serve the needs of the less robust intelligences. In addition to the stimulus imparted by the requirements of the higher education, there arose a spirit of general curiosity in polite circles, which contributed towards the literary splendours of the Augustan age. Such considerations will explain that, where dependence upon authority was universal, its frequent acknowledgement became tedious and unnecessary: a reference or allusion might be borrowed without any sacrifice of literary candour. But the character of the witness is a most material factor in the valuation of the record, and it is also essential to remember the particular object which he had in view. At first sight there is no reason to suspect that Ovid's reference to the Ἀχιλλέως ἐρασταί¹, and Horace's to the *Peleus*², were not inspired by their familiarity with the texts of the Greek tragedians. But we cannot so conclude with any certainty: there is abundant evidence of Ovid's dependence on the mythographical tradition, and the Ars Poetica is known to have been based upon the treatise of Neoptolemus of Parium³. A specimen of the manuals available for the use of the Augustan poets is preserved in the booklet of Parthenius of Nicaea περὶ ἐρωτικῶν παθημάτων. As its title indicates, this was a collection of love-stories with unhappy endings, each of which is prefaced with a statement of the literary authority or authorities responsible for the form of the narrative adopted⁴. The work was dedicated to Cornelius Gallus, the elegiac poet, and was written expressly for the purpose of assisting his memory, if he chose to employ the material in future poems. The Euryalus of Sophocles⁵ is quoted as sole authority for the tale of Odysseus' love for Euippe and its fatal issue, and to Parthenius, if not to Gallus, the play was probably familiar. Cicero stands on a different footing to most of our informants; for he has admitted us to the secrets of his workshop. Cicero was undoubtedly a

Cicero and the philosophers.

¹ I p. 104.

² A. P. 96.

³ Meineke, Anal. Alex. p. 360. Catull. 70. 3 refers rather to a familiar proverb than to the text of Sophocles (fr. 811).

⁴ Hercher in Herm. xii 306 ff. contended that the names were a later addition, but their trustworthiness in general was maintained by Bethe (ib. xxxviii 608 ff.). It is possible that they were taken from Pamphilus' Δειμών.

⁵ I p. 145.

student of the text of Sophocles. In this connexion the allusions to the Latin versions of the *Erigone*¹ and the *Σύνδειπνοι*² which Quintus sent to his brother from Gaul are more significant than the casual quotations in the letters to Atticus³. But when he compares the treatment by Pacuvius and Sophocles of the scene where the wounded Ulysses is carried home to die⁴, when he recalls the line of the Epigoni with which Cleanthes rebuked the apostate Dionysius⁵, and when he offers a Latin rendering of the speech in the Teucer moralizing on the hypocrisies of consolation⁶, it is not difficult to guess that the references to Sophocles were suggested to him by the Greek originals from which he put together the Tusculan disputations. In the post-Aristotelian schools there had arisen a custom which, if not originated by Chrysippus, found in him its chief representative,—that of enveloping their arguments with a cloud of poetic witnesses. To this custom we owe the quotations and allusions of Philodemus the Epicurean, even if he did not borrow all of them from an earlier source. No such hesitation is necessary in regard to Seneca⁷, whose naturales quaestiones were largely drawn from Posidonius through the medium of Asclepiodotus. The name of Philo of Alexandria (c. 39 A.D.) occurs only twice in the list of sources⁸: in one case it is not certain that he is referring to Sophocles at all; in the other the Stoic colour of the context is so clearly manifest that the origin of the quotation is scarcely doubtful.

The writers on the art of rhetoric are open to a similar suspicion,—that of having borrowed from their Peripatetic predecessors. Demetrius in his de elocutione,—a treatise whose authorship and date are both uncertain, but which recent critics put somewhere within the limits 100 B.C. and 100 A.D.,—quotes fr. 611 on the authority of Theophrastus⁹, just as he takes Eur.

Writers on rhetoric.

¹ I p. 173.

² II p. 201.

³ frs. 636, 662, 768.

⁴ Tusc. 2. 48-50.

⁵ Tusc. 2. 60.

⁶ fr. 576.

⁷ fr. 882. Laurentius Lydus derives from Seneca. For the history of the doxographical tradition concerning the causes of the summer rising of the Nile see Diels, Dox. Gr. p. 226 ff. The scholia to Apollonius Rhodius are, of course, not independent.—It would be rash to assume that Seneca translated fr. 665 in the Hercules Oetaeus.

⁸ frs. 755, 945.

⁹ fr. 94 Wimmer.

fr. 515 from Praxiphanes. No such declared source is forthcoming for the allusions of the author of the de sublimitate or of Dionysius of Halicarnassus in the *de compositione verborum*¹. The miscellaneous learning recorded by the last-named author in the first book of the Antiquitates Romanae, in connexion with the Oenotrians, the Tyrrheno-Pelasgians, and the flight of Aeneas from Troy, was collected in part at any rate by Varro². The book περὶ τρόπων, which passes for the work of Tryphon, is a garbled extract from the grammarian who was a younger contemporary of Didymus³.

Strabo.

Strabo (c. 63 B.C.—23 A.D.) owed his geographical information more largely to books than to the records of his own observation. His two chief sources were Artemidorus of Ephesus⁴ (c. 100 B.C.), the writer of a periplus of the Mediterranean Sea in eleven books, who in his turn compiled from Agatharchides, Timosthenes, Eratosthenes, and others, and Apollodorus of Athens, whose commentary on the Homeric catalogue of ships was not the least remarkable of his critical labours⁵. Thus at least six of the fragments preserved in Strabo may be referred to the authority of Apollodorus⁶; one at least appears to go back to Eratosthenes⁷; and Demetrius of Scepsis (c. 150 B.C.), whose work on the Trojan catalogue (Hom. B 816—877) was used by Strabo as well as the better-known treatise of Apollodorus, has been identified as the original source of the ¹ frs. 768, 774. See also Introductory Note to the Polyxena (II p. 162). The work of pseudo-Longinus is now with general consent assigned to the first century A.D. The later rhetoricians contribute little. Hermogenes (b. 160 A.D.) probably took his illustration φιλανδρος (fr. 1111) from an earlier τέχνη; Menander (c. 270 A.D.) introduces Sophocles into a discussion of hymns called διαπορητικοί (fr. 809); and Phoebeamon, a contemporary of Synesius, repeats a familiar example of epanalepsis (fr. 753), which recurs in John of Sicily (11th cent., according to Krumbacher, p. 191).

² frs. 598, 270, 373. Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 306₁₄. The appearance of fr. 270, 4 in schol. Ap. Rhod. is significant.

³ See frs. 487, 963. Cocondrius and Polybius of Sardis of course followed the rhetorical tradition. Suid. s.v. Τρόπων assigns the rhetorical book to the grammarian.

⁴ Susemihl, I 695.

⁵ For the particular sections of Strabo attributable to Apollodorus see E. Schwartz in Pauly-Wissowa I 2867–2870.

⁶ frs. 24, 411, 522, 957, 1086, 1110.

⁷ fr. 959. The reference to the Triptolemus (II p. 243) is also derived ultimately from Eratosthenes.

curious information relating to the Idaean Dactyls¹. The naturalis historia of the elder Pliny (23—69 A.D.) is a work which to an even greater extent was made up of excerpts taken from previous authors. No fewer than 146 Roman and 327 foreign writers were utilized for the purpose; and so little was Pliny disposed to conceal his obligations that he prefixed to each book a list of the chief authorities upon which it depended. Of the fragments which he cites from Sophocles² the first is inserted in the course of a passage borrowed from Theophrastus, and the manner of its introduction shows that Pliny had access to the tradition of the didascaliae; the second is a botanical memorandum, which came immediately from Sextius Niger, but may have been drawn ultimately from the ῥιζοτομικόν of Diocles of Carystus, a distinguished physician contemporary with Plato. Dion of Prusa in Bithynia, or Dion Chrysostom, as he is usually styled, belongs to the end of the period now under discussion. His devotion to the study of the great Attic tragedians is attested by his well-known essay on the treatment of the story of Philoctetes by Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides respectively³. We should not, therefore, expect him to quote at second hand; but his testimony consists only of an allusion to the *Thyestes*⁴, with perhaps another to an important fragment of the *Aleadae*⁵. Last of all comes Plutarch (46—120 A.D.), one of our most valuable sources, whose quotations are those of a first-rate artist steeped in the knowledge of his native literature. Although he sometimes quoted from memory, particularly if the line had become somewhat hackneyed⁶, it is scarcely doubtful that in most cases he drew from the originals. The occasional coincidences with Stobaeus and Clement⁷ are probably accidental, and are anyhow quite insufficient to prove that Plutarch habitually made use of an anthology. Here and there he repeats a quotation which he must have found in his

The elder Pliny.

Dion Chrysostom.

Plutarch.

¹ E. Schwartz in Pauly-Wissowa IV 280g. Otherwise Bethe in Herm. XXIV 411.

² frs. 600, 830. Cf. II p. 66. A particularly interesting example, which shows conclusively the second-hand character of Pliny's information, is referred to by Jebb on O. T. p. 232.

³ Or. 32 (II 104 Arn.). For a description see Jebb's Philoctetes, p. xvi.

⁴ I p. 92.

⁵ fr. 88.

⁶ frs. 662, 776, 840.

⁷ For examples see frs. 81, 88, 636, 770, 771, 929.

source. Fr. 873 is a clear instance, made more conspicuous by the repetition of Dio Cassius and Appian; and one may suspect that in some of the ethical treatises, such as the περὶ τύχης and the περὶ ἀρετῆς καὶ κακίας, which by their style betray the influence of the philosophical schools, the quotations were taken over together with the text which they served to illustrate¹. It is probable also that in the book πῶς δεῖ τὸν νέον ποιημάτων ἀκούειν Plutarch borrowed extensively from a work of Chrysippus similarly entitled², although the limits of his obligation cannot be accurately fixed.

Atticism.

The second century A.D. owes such importance as it possesses in the history of Greek literature in large measure to the classical revival known as Atticism. It was, as has been already pointed out, the product of an age to which substance had become less essential than style, and whose study of the ancient classics was limited by the practical object of fostering rhetorical ability. We shall presently describe the efforts of the lexicographers to provide the studious with the necessary material for the cultivation of purity of diction; the general literature, if we include under this term the representative sophists, is of minor importance for the present purpose, and will not detain us long. The most famous names of the Hellenic renaissance which started in the reign of Hadrian, and lasted for more than a century, are Lucian, Aristides, and the Philostrati. Lucian refers to the *Locrian Ajax*³, perhaps also to the *Cedalion*⁴, and quotes a fragment from the Meleager without naming the play⁵. Aelius Aristides shows his acquaintance with the text of the *Ἑλένης γάμος*⁶, and compares the treacherous beacon of Nauplius with the work of incendiaries at Eleusis⁷. The Philostrati scarcely

¹ The remark applies to frs. 373, 843, 844. It should be observed that the reference to ἥθους as πηγή, which almost immediately precedes the quotation of fr. 373, was borrowed from Zeno (I 203 Arn., fr. 146 P.). The difficulties which Plutarch's text involves (see note in loc.) are perhaps the result of a confused epitome.

² II p. 202 Arn.

³ I p. 10.

⁴ II p. 9.

⁵ fr. 401.

⁶ I p. 126. Phot. bibl. p. 438^a 6, and Choric. pro mimis 6. 27 (Revue de Philol. I 222), follow Aristides. For fr. 756 see note in loc. The repetition of two familiar tags (frs. 14, 733) is unimportant.

⁷ fr. 435.

come into the account. Philostratus the Athenian quotes only from the Oedipus Tyrannus, Oedipus Coloneus, and Antigone, in the Life of Apollonius, and from the Electra in the Lives of the sophists,—sufficient evidence surely that in his day these plays had a certain degree of celebrity above their fellows. In the heroicus and imagines, which are ascribed to his kinsman and contemporary known as Philostratus the Lemnian¹, there may be many reminiscences of tragedy, such as the passage quoted by Nauck in illustration of the discoveries of Palamedes²; but they are seldom acknowledged, and have in consequence generally ceased to be traceable. The imagines of the younger Philostratus, who describes himself as grandson of the Lemnian on the mother's side, are separated by an interval of seventy or more years from the publication of the earlier series. He quotes the Oedipus Coloneus and the Philoctetes, and his allusion to Sophocles' description of Scyros as wind-swept³, and his description of the 'meeting of Phoenix with Neoptolemus, suggest that he was acquainted with the Scyrians. But the general character of his work, apart altogether from his date, makes the inference extremely questionable⁴. Aelian, who survived the death of Aelian. Caracalla (222 A.D.), was a contemporary of Philostratus the Athenian. Though in intention a stylist, being at the same time an industrious collector of unconsidered trifles, he reflects the preference of his age for spurious learning to independent research. The fragments resting on his authority are taken from the de natura animalium, and were derived by Aelian through his source Alexander of Myndos (before 50 A.D.) from Aristophanes of Byzantium and others of the Alexandrian school⁵. From Aelian we pass to Athenaeus, an important Athenaeus. witness, to whom we owe more than sixty quotations. The investigation of the sources from which Athenaeus drew his

¹ On the Philostrati see J. S. Phillimore's Philostratus, 1 pp. XXXIV—XLV. A different distribution of the extant works is recommended by Christ-Schmid, op. cit. 11^b p. 608 ff.

² See on fr. 432, 2.

³ fr. 553.

⁴ Wilamowitz, Einleitung in d. gr. Tr. p. 201.

⁵ See especially nat. an. 7. 39 ad fin. The reference to Aristotle (ibid. 11. 18) points in the same direction, since Alexander's chief source was Aristophanes' ἐπιτομή of Aristotle's zoological teaching.

abundant supply of quotations is rendered unusually difficult by the fact that the Deipnosophists has come down to us in an abbreviated form, and by the tendency of its author to interrupt the course of a borrowed extract with material which he had gathered elsewhere¹. It is admitted that he was not merely a compiler. He had studied widely in the ancient texts for the purpose of illustrating his various topics, and a considerable proportion of the numerous passages taken from the plays of the comic poets was undoubtedly due to his own researches. Tragedy was less likely to provide him with material; and he was content to accept its evidence at second hand. At any rate, a careful scrutiny into the character of his quotations from Sophocles will confirm the judgement pronounced by Wilamowitz² that not a single tragedy was quoted directly. Although the nature of Athenaeus' book, even apart from its tradition, is such as unduly to favour the impression that it largely consists of glosses unskilfully strung together, we shall hardly err in concluding that many of the Sophoclean fragments were derived from the lexicographers. That the glosses were taken from a lexicon is sometimes betrayed by their alphabetical order, as may be seen from the list of cups given in the eleventh book, where the name of Pamphilus occurs several times. It has already been mentioned that Pamphilus, who was perhaps the chief lexicographical authority of Athenaeus, had incorporated the results of Didymus' τραγικαὶ λέξεις. Athenaeus often discloses the name of his authority,—the ultimate, it may be, rather than the immediate source. Thus, fr. 718 was derived from the commentary of Didymus, fr. 324 from Speusippus *περὶ ὁμοίων*³, fr. 28 from Cephisodorus the pupil of Isocrates, fr. 111 from Tryphon⁴, and fr. 12 from Aristoxenus' Life of Archytas. In

¹ Clear instances of such interruption will be found in the quotations relating to the polypus and the μύνης inserted at 513 C and 487 D respectively.

² op. cit. p. 176.

³ This was a survey and classification of natural history. See Zeller's Plato and the older Academy, p. 567²⁸ E. tr.

⁴ The statement suggests that he was also the source of frs. 137 and 230.—In regard to fr. 606 a neat point arises which is not without a bearing on the criticism of the text. It is clear that Athenaeus and Pollux both used the same source; and, apart from the evidence of the Philetærus (of which more presently), περὶ μου. λέξ.

other cases the source may be identified by inference or probable conjecture. Thus fr. 502 is shown to have been derived from Apollodorus περὶ ἑταιρῶν by its recurrence in Harpocration, fr. 448 may be referred to Chamaeleon¹, fr. 765 to Satyrus or Hermippus, fr. 121 to Clearchus περὶ γρίφων, fr. 474 to the same writer's ἐρωτική, fr. 307 to his *περὶ παροιμιῶν*², and fr. 735 to Theophrastus περὶ μέθης. Sometimes the ownership of the borrowed material is no longer traceable³, or the quotation bears the appearance of having been made independently for the position which it occupies⁴. But an example will show that appearances are not always to be trusted. In the course of a discussion on the use of μύρον and its effect upon the senses, Athenaeus interpolates as a reason for anointing the breast the statement that the vital principle (ψυχή) is situated in the heart⁵, and appeals to the testimony of Soph. fr. 766 amongst other poetical authorities. The names of two physicians Praxagoras and Phylotimus are mentioned as holding the same opinion, and at first sight it might be inferred that Athenaeus either took his quotations from one or the other of them, or collected them himself in corroboration of their view. But the dogma that the principate (ἡγεμονικόν) of the soul, that is to say, the mind, resides in the heart was strenuously maintained by the Stoic school, and Chrysippus supported it by thousands of

p. 35, 19, quoting Aesch. fr. 211, suggests that this was Herodian. But there are good reasons for believing that Athenaeus did not use Herodian: see Kaibel on 52 D. The common source must therefore be earlier than his time, and we shall find subsequently that this conclusion may be recommended on other grounds.

¹ Fr. 345, which relates to the same subject, occurs in the neighbourhood of two other quotations which are repeated in Plut. amal. 5 p. 751 C. It may be inferred that Plutarch and Athenaeus were indebted to the same original. Plutarch then proceeds to quote Pind. Pyth. 2. 42, and illustrates it by the same fragment of Sappho (fr. 34) which is adduced by Pindar's scholiast.

² Cf. 317 A.

³ frs. 760 and 761 come from a rhetorical discussion of μεταφορά after Arist. rhet. 3. 10. 1411^a 1 ff., fr. 378 from some writer of συμπόσιακά, frs. 277 and 537 from a dissertation on the game cottabus, frs. 239, 241, and 412 perhaps from the θεατρικὴ ἱστορία of Juba (FHG III 481).

⁴ The remark applies especially to such cases as frs. 329, 563, and 757, or Eur. fr. 899, where the quotations belong to the framework of the dialogue.

⁵ See 687 E.

quotations from the poets¹. Here then is enough to awaken suspicion. Now, a good deal of Chrysippus περὶ ψυχῆς has been preserved by Galen, and our suspicion is confirmed when we find that the two separate lines which Athenaeus quotes from the Odyssey appear at the head of the list of Homeric quotations which Galen repeats after Chrysippus². If any doubt remains concerning the source of Athenaeus, it is dissipated by the further discovery that Chrysippus appealed to the authority of Praxagoras in opposition to those medical writers who made the head the centre of the nervous system³.

Scientific and technical writers.

The scientific and departmental writers who flourished in the second and early part of the third century shared the general failure of independence which characterized their epoch, and their show of learning is even less to be credited when it falls outside their proper sphere. It is a rare exception when Aulus Gellius testifies to his personal acquaintance with the text of the *Locrian Ajax*⁴. Galen professedly owed his poetical illustrations of the word πέμφυξ to the *γραμματικοί*⁵, from whom also Sextus Empiricus quoted the Phrygian *βαλλήν*⁶. The same source may be confidently assumed for Rufus Ephesius, the writer on anatomy, from his agreement with Hesychius and the scholiast on Aristophanes⁷. Achilles, the commentator on Aratus, drew his material from Posidonius through Diodorus of Alexandria⁸. Diogenes Laertius quotes two of the fragments⁹: one of these he derived from Antigonus of Carystus¹⁰ (third

¹ E. V. Arnold, Roman Stoicism, p. 2458.

² Galen Hipp. et Plat. plac. 3. 2 p. 260 M. (II 906 Arn.). From ib. 3. 4 p. 281 M. (II 907 Arn.) we learn that tragic quotations were included in the collection.

³ Galen ib. 1. 7 p. 145 M. (II 897 Arn.).

⁴ fr. 14. Cf. fr. 695. He states that he heard Peregrinus quote fr. 307.

⁵ frs. 337, 338, 538, 539. Wilamowitz, op. cit. p. 176. Note the coincidence with Photius in regard to Aesch. fr. 170.

⁶ fr. 515.

⁷ fr. 596.

⁸ frs. 432, 737, 738. With him goes the anonymous writer who quotes fr. 752. In regard to all this class of literature I transcribe the caustic judgement of Diels (Doxogr. p. 19): 'scilicet tum ea ars, quae vetera furando nova scripta gignebat non inventa quidem, sed consummata esse videtur. neque frustra Clemens Alexandrinus ipse fur callidissimus furtorum catalogum congegit sive potius et ipsum descripsit Strom. VI 2.'

⁹ frs. 477, 873.

¹⁰ Wilamowitz, Antigonos von Karystos, p. 74.

century B.C.) and the other from Diocles of Magnesia (b. 80—70 B.C.). Artemidorus, who wrote on the interpretation of dreams, cites fr. 860 without the author's name and obviously at second hand¹. Porphyrius (233—304 A.D.) quotes fr. 398 in the de abstinencia, fr. 879 in the de antro nympharum, and fr. 108 in the quaestiones Homericae. As a Homeric critic he was of course familiar with grammatical learning, and, though he was skilful enough to present the appearance of an independent writer, Bernays showed that the de abstinencia was largely composed of extracts from Theophrastus *περὶ εὐσεβείας*². Hyginus the mythographer is of importance rather in relation to the plots of the lost plays than as a witness to the fragments. The date of the handbook can only be determined in so far as it was certainly written before 207 A.D., when it was translated into Greek³; but the scholarship of its author may be gauged by his description of Melanippe as daughter of Desmon, no doubt after the Euripidean title *Μελανίππη ἡ δεσμώτις*⁴. It is beyond question that he derives from a Greek original belonging to the same stream of tradition as that which pseudo-Apollodorus followed⁵. The sources of the second book of the poetica astronomia, another work passing by the name of Hyginus, have been examined by Robert⁶: it is sufficient to say that the chief authority used was the καταστερισμοί of Eratosthenes, but that traces are also to be found of Parmeniscus, Asclepiades of Tragilus, and some others. Servius, the Vergilian commentator, refers to the Laocoon of Sophocles⁷ for a mythological detail which no one supposes that he had learnt by an inspection of the original; but from what source he derived this and his veiled allusion to the *Lacaenae*⁸ we are not in a position to determine.

¹ For the work of Artemidorus see Susemihl, I 868.

² J. Bernays, Theophrasts Schrift über Frömmigkeit, Berlin, 1866. He has, however, demonstrated that the passage in which the Sophoclean extract occurs is actually an inset made in accordance with the plan acknowledged by Porphyrius at the end of 2. 33, and interrupting the course of the argument. He identifies the grammarian (p. 71) from whom Porphyrius got the quotations with Aristomenes, who was a freedman of Hadrian, and whose τὰ πρὸς τὰς ἑρμηνείας is quoted by Athen. 115 A.

³ See M. Schmidt's edition at p. LIV.

⁴ Fab. 186.

⁵ For the earliest mythographical handbook see Susemihl, II 50 and sup. p. xxvi.

⁶ Eratosthenis catasterismorum reliquiae, Berlin, 1878.

⁷ fr. 372.

⁸ fr. 367. Hyginus and Varro were among his sources.

The interpretation of Vergil gives Macrobius occasion to cite a remarkable fragment¹ from the 'Πιζοτόμοι of Sophocles, which he supposes Vergil to have copied; but it is impossible to allow Macrobius himself the credit of making the comparison. The same writer reproduces the whole of Athenaeus' note on καρχήσιον, and, as included in it, the quotation of fr. 660.

Fourth and fifth centuries
A.D.

The names of Servius and Macrobius have been introduced by anticipation. Though neither of them wrote in Greek, they are both representative of the last stage of the common Graeco-Roman culture which immediately preceded the centuries of Byzantine decadence. In its various branches Nonnus, Libanius, Heliodorus, and Proclus were the chief pillars of the dying Greek literature. But, except in the mechanical repetitions of successive generations of grammarians and lexicographers, or in the traditional quotation of a stock passage by sophists and rhetoricians², the memory of Attic tragedy was almost entirely extinct. The partisans of Hellenism were fighting in a losing cause, and the efforts of the best of them, praiseworthy as they are, show how narrow and superficial was their acquaintance with the works of the ancient masters. Julian never quotes Sophocles by name, and none of the fragments so far as we know has the support of his authority³. It would be too much to assert that he was not acquainted with a single one of the plays; for phrases occur which are reasonably regarded as echoes of the Antigone and the *Philoctetes*⁴. But Homer and Plato, the

¹ fr. 534. It is clear that he followed one of the ancient commentators on Vergil both here and in his comparison of Aen. 4. 698 with Eur. Alc. 73. See Nettleship in Conington's Vergil, 1st p. XLVIII f. These Vergilian scholia, as well as those on Lucan and Statius, go back to Greek sources (Wilamowitz, op. cit. p. 167). The point illustrated by Macrobius is the ritual sanctity of brass, and Sophocles is the only Greek author cited.

² Such is the quotation of fr. 940 by Gregory of Nazianzus. Echoes of frs. 661 and 929 are found in Nicephorus Gregoras and Ioannes Chumnos, who lived as late as the fourteenth century. A familiar instance is the wearisome recurrence of Eur. fr. 484, 1 ὄκ' ἐμὸς ὁ μῦθος ἀλλὰ... in Julian and others. Fr. 14 is quoted both by Libanius and Themistius.

³ The passage quoted by Nauck on fr. 811 is obviously not an allusion (except indirectly) to Sophocles.

⁴ 132 C ἀκρίς δελίου (Ant. 100); 447 B τὸν φιλτατον, ὡς φῆς, ἀνέμων (Phil. 273). Sandys, Hist. Cl. Schol. 1 p. 359, infers from the fact that O. T. 614 is followed (338 C)

study of whose writings was kept alive by the lectures of the Neoplatonists, are the only ancient authors to whom he freely refers¹. Libanius (314—393 A.D.), the foremost man of letters of his age, is hardly in a better case than his imperial patron, although his reading was naturally wider². It is true that his acquaintance with Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides is vouched on the authority of his latest editor³; but it is not evident that this implies a wider knowledge of their text than is open to a scholar of the present day. His reference to the Tereus (II p. 224) does not prove that he knew the play, and his allusion to the ill treatment of Minos on the stage was derived from Plutarch or the pseudo-Platonic *Minos*⁴. Though Libanius is our sole authority for fr. 808, the sentiment there expressed is of a familiar currency; and the appearance of two parallel passages from Euripides⁵ in the immediate context suggests that all three were borrowed from an anthology. Nor is the character of his other references to tragic fragments such as to inspire confidence in the extent of his knowledge⁶. Synesius, who was born a few years after the death of Julian and survived Libanius by some twenty years, is one of the most attractive figures of his age. He is the last representative of the genuine Hellenic spirit, never ceasing to urge upon his hearers the importance of literary and philosophical studies⁷. But his own knowledge was neither deep nor wide, and the preponderating influence of Homer and Plato is even more clearly marked than by the words ὡς παρὰ τῶν ἑμπροσθεν ἔγνωμεν, that the name of the author was unknown, and that Sophocles was evidently no longer read. His quotations from Eur. (see e.g. 445 B) are confined to the Bacchae, Phoenissae, and Orestes.

¹ He had also studied Aristotle and Theophrastus: Sandys, p. 357.

² Themistius (IV 71) mentions Thuc., Isocr., Dem., Plat., and Arist., as the five classics chiefly studied at Constantinople, and elsewhere (XXIII 350) adds Aristophanes as a sixth. Libanius (iii. 438) speaks vaguely of his readings in the poets.

³ R. Foerster in Rh. Mus. XXXII 87. Unger cleverly emended ep. 1398 from Eur. I.A. 128.

⁴ [Plat.] Min. 318 E, 321 A; Plut. Thes. 16; Liban. III 64. It is highly probable that the Camici (II p. 3) was one of the plays illustrating the tragic conception of Minos as an overbearing and cruel tyrant.

⁵ Hec. 596, Or. 126.

⁶ Aesch. fr. 340 and Eur. fr. 934 are among the more favourable examples.

⁷ R. Volkmann, Synesios, pp. 134—136.

in Julian¹. He can hardly be cited as a witness for fr. 948, and a vague reference to Ai. 1146² is almost the only indication of an acquaintance with Sophocles.

Scholia.

The immediate sources of the greater number of the fragments are the collections of scholia, the Byzantine lexicons, and the anthology of Stobaeus. The most important of the scholia are found in the MSS of the three tragedians, Aristophanes, Homer, Pindar, Plato, and the Alexandrian poets. The labours of Didymus in relation to Sophocles and Euripides have already been mentioned, and his services to Aeschylus, although less clearly attested, are believed to have been of a similar character³. The remaining scholia, so far as they concern us here, will next be briefly described.

Aristo-
phanic
scholia.

The scholia of Aristophanes, although for obvious reasons their evidence more often touches Euripides, are nevertheless, as we have seen⁴, of considerable importance for Sophocles. The citations from ancient poets were due almost entirely to Didymus⁵, who here as elsewhere drew upon the learning of his predecessors. The extent of his influence is not to be measured, except in comparison with others, by the sixty-four explicit references to his name⁶. Phaeinus and Symmachus, who are mentioned in the subscriptio of the Venetus to the Nubes and to the Pax, have been identified as the immediate sources of the extant collection. Symmachus, whose name occurs some forty times in the scholia, was an Alexandrian who lived about a century after Didymus, and shows himself to be capable of exercising an independent judgement⁷. Phaeinus, by some regarded as an early Byzantine, is of no importance except as

¹ W. S. Crawford, Synesius the Hellene, 1901, has a useful list (pp. 522--579) of the literary quotations in Synesius. It must, however, be used with caution.

² Quoted by Jebb, in loc. For references to Euripides, such as they are, see frs. 300, 723.

³ Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa v 451.

⁴ p. xlvii.

⁵ His commentary is mentioned by Athen. 67 D Διδυμος δ' ἐξηγούμενος τὸ λαμβεῖον (Plut. 720) κτλ. A good account of it is given by Cohn, loc. 455.

⁶ No less than thirty-three are in the scholia to the Aves.

⁷ Wilamowitz treats Symmachus as the first compiler of our collection of scholia. Williams White, however, as we have already seen (p. xlii), holding that such collections were not anterior to the age of the parchment book, takes a somewhat different view of the activities of Symmachus.

a compiler, and may have been responsible for the inclusion of the colometry of Heliodorus, and of extracts from Herodian and other authorities later than Symmachus.

We owe twenty-two valuable quotations to the scholia on Pindar. These may be assigned without hesitation to Didymus, who was responsible for practically the whole of the learned material preserved in these commentaries¹. Our collection goes back to an edition of the Epinicia in the second century A.D., which repeated the substance of Didymus' work without adding much of importance. The date is approximately fixed by a quotation from Amyntianus², a writer who dedicated his history of Alexander the Great to the emperor Marcus. In two instances at least we are able to go beyond Didymus: the illustration of τῶν τριῶν ἔν³ was taken from the περὶ παροιμιῶν of Aristides of Miletus, which is dated in the second half of the second century B.C.⁴, and the proverb ἀφ' ἐστίας ἄρχεσθαι was discussed by Aristocritus, who belonged to the same period⁵.

The minute study of the Platonic dialogues was not seriously undertaken before the age of the Roman empire, and received its chief impulse from the Neoplatonic movement. Our scholia, however, deal with the explanation of rare words (γλῶσσαι), obscure phrases (λέξεις), and proverbs (παροιμιαί), rather than with the exposition of the philosophical argument; and the extracts which contain quotations from Sophocles are representative of the general character of the collection. It is not surprising to find coincidences with Hesychius⁶, since Diogenian, whose name is quoted four times in the scholia, must have been a common source of both. But the majority of the quotations was introduced to illustrate proverbs which occur in the text of Plato, and the scholia derive from the same sources as the paroemiographic corpus, to which we shall presently return.

¹ Wilamowitz, op. cit. p. 157; Cohn, l.c. 450.

² Schol. Pind. Ol. 3. 52.

³ fr. 908.

⁴ For Aristides see Paroem. I p. XII, Crusius, Anal. p. 79. Steph. Byz. p. 249, 12 (cf. Suid. s.v. Δωδωναίων χαλκείων) shows that he was later than Polemon, from whom he quoted.

⁵ FHG IV 336.

⁶ frs. 59, 425, 633: cf. also fr. 408, the substance of which goes back to Aristophanes of Byzantium.

Thus Didymus is referred to on Cratyl. 384 A in connexion with the proverb χαλεπὰ τὰ καλὰ, and to him rather than to Tarrhaeus¹ were due most of the quotations in schol. rep. 337 A. It should be noticed that the explanations of the Platonic scholia are generally fuller and richer than the text of the corpus.

Scholia
on Alex-
andrians.

The scholia to the Alexandrians, of whom Apollonius Rhodius is for the present purpose the most important, may be taken together. In all of them Theon² occupies a position analogous to that of Didymus in the criticism of the tragedians and Pindar. The subscriptio to the Laurentian MS of Apollonius states that the scholia are taken from Lucillus Tarrhaeus, Sophocles, and Theon. This is interpreted to mean that Sophocles put together the collection in the fourth century from the earlier commentaries of Lucillus and Theon³. Irenaeus (also known by the Latinized name of Minucius Pacatus), who is mentioned four times in the scholia as the author of a commentary (ὑπόμνημα), seems to have belonged to the latter part of the first century A.D. Theon was the sole source of all that is valuable in the scholia to Theocritus, but our collection belongs to a later date. Wilamowitz conjectured that they were edited by Amarantus, an elder contemporary of Galen, whose name is attached in the Etymologicum Magnum to the views expressed in the scholia⁴. This assumption agrees with the fact that the scholia often controvert the opinions of a certain Munatius, who is identified with Munatius ὁ κριτικός, a native of Tralles and a member of the circle of Herodes Atticus⁵. In Steph. Byz. p. 375, 10 we read that Theon, Plutarch, and Demetrius Phalereus were the names of the commentators on Nicander. The last-mentioned is unquestionably an error for Demetrius Chorus who is referred to in several notes⁶ as supporting views subsequently rejected by Antigonus. Antigonus lived in the early part of the first century B.C., as is inferred from the position in which his name

¹ Cf. fr. 160. According to Cohn, in Jahrb. f. cl. Phil. Suppl. XIII at p. 840, Tarrhaeus was the immediate source of these scholia. See however Crusius, Anal. p. 94 f. Is Κλέταρχος an error for Κλέταρχος (Crusius, Anal. p. 83) in schol. rep. 337 A?

² See p. xlv.

³ Wilamowitz, op. cit. p. 187.

⁴ See Etym. M. p. 273, 41, as compared with schol. Theocr. 7. 154.

⁵ Philostr. vit. soph. 1. 25. 16.

⁶ Theocr. 377, 585, 748.

occurs in the preface to Erotian¹, so that in the case of Nicander we are able to pass back to sources anterior to Theon. On the other hand, with the exception of Theon, tradition is silent respecting the names of those who worked on the text of Lycophron until the time of Nicetas, the bishop of Serrha, who copied out the codex Marcianus 476 in the eleventh century.

It is unnecessary for the present purpose to examine in detail the history of the Homeric scholia; for it is notorious that they contain rich stores of Alexandrian learning. Even in the limited field of Sophoclean quotations the value of Venetus A is manifest. From the subscriptions at the end of every book it appears that the collection, which was perhaps made in the second century A.D., was based upon an amalgamation of excerpts from Didymus' περὶ τῆς Ἀρισταρχείου διορθώσεως, Aristonicus' *περὶ σημείων τῶν τῆς Ἰλιάδος καὶ τῆς Ὀδυσσεΐας*², Herodian's περὶ τῆς Ὀμηρικῆς προσφθίας, and Nicanor's περὶ Ὀμηρικῆς στιγμῆς. The works of Didymus, Aristonicus, and Nicanor belonged to the department of textual criticism; and of the ten quotations and allusions which rest upon the authority of Ven. A five may be conjectured to owe their survival to Herodian³. The explanation of γλῶσσαι and *λέξεις*⁴, where the scholia are found to be in agreement with the extant lexicons, was largely the work of Aristarchus, whose name is mentioned together with Apion and Heliodorus in Hesychius' prefatory letter to Eulogius. The lexicon of Apollonius, which depended on the same sources, survives only in an abridged form, so that it is seldom of value where a fuller version exists elsewhere⁵. In one case we are referred to the authority of Crates of Mallus⁶. The elucidation of mythological details was the principal subject of Didymus' *ὑπομνήματα*⁷, and many notes of this complexion in the scholia are attributed to him by name.

In connexion with the scholia the Homeric commentaries

¹ p. 32, 11 Klein. Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa I 2422.

² This was a digest of Aristarchus' explanation of the critical signs (obelus, &c.) used by him in his edition.

³ frs. 43, 94, 582, 901, 1056.

⁴ See e.g. frs. 454, 611, 785, 793, 906.

⁵ Apollonius, s.v. κατά, quotes A 424 (fr. 898) for κατά = ἐπεὶ.

⁶ fr. 1060.

⁷ Schol. δ 4 may be an example (I p. 141).

Homeric
scholia.

Eusta-
thius.

(παρεκβολαὶ εἰς τὴν Ὅμηρον Ἰλιάδα [Ὀδύσσειαν]) of Eustathius must be mentioned. They were written at some time before 1175 A.D., in which year their author was appointed Archbishop of Thessalonica by the emperor Manuel I. The value of the books consists in their enormously rich store of extracts from philological writings which have now been lost; for it is quite certain that the quotations from the ancient classics were all at second hand, and that the plays of Sophocles outside the selection had perished long before the time of Eustathius¹. Nor does Eustathius seek to conceal his dependence upon earlier sources, although he often succeeds in hiding their identity by the use of such vague expressions as φασί, κατὰ τοὺς παλαιούς, λέγεται, and the like². But, although this lack of precision and still more the tendency to garble his extracts by abbreviation are to be regretted, the main channels of tradition which Eustathius followed are either obvious or have been definitely ascertained³. Thus, he borrowed large blocks of material from the Deipnosophists of Athenaeus, and is in no sense an independent witness for the quotations of the earlier writer⁴. It should also be noticed that his text of Athenaeus was the epitomized version represented in the MSS known as C and E⁵. Strabo was copied almost as freely as Athenaeus, but only twice where Sophocles is concerned⁶. Next, it is certain that much of Eustathius is nearly related to the tradition of the Homeric scholia. For the Iliad he employed a MS containing a collection of scholia which

¹ This fact was first clearly recognized by Valckenaer, Opusc. i 337 f. Jebb on O. T. 1264 and on Ant. 292 (at p. 250) gives the impression that Eustathius' quotations were usually made at first hand. It is clear, also, from the remarks in his Bacchylides (p. 76) that he took the same view of citations by such writers as Stobaeus and Priscian. Rutherford in his New Phrynichus (p. 84) does not appear to have observed that the evidence of the Etym. M. goes back to the older authorities from which it is derived.

² φασί: frs. 166, 237, 702, 791, 794, 1006. κατὰ τοὺς παλαιούς (φασιν οἱ παλαιοί): frs. 108, 1046, 1049, 1087. λέγεται: fr. 1105.

³ In the following account much use has been made of Cohn's article in Pauly-Wissowa VI 1452—1489.

⁴ frs. 19, 28, 111, 127, 154, 181, 314, 275, 318, 329, 378, 395, 565, 718, 760.

⁵ For examples see the nn. on frs. 154, 181 (where A has πέπον), 318.

⁶ See fr. 1086, i p. 86. Eustathius frequently quotes from an epitome of Stephen of Byzantium, but there is no such instance in the Sophoclean sources.

bore the names of Apion and Herodorus¹, and was derived from the same sources as the scholia in the extant MSS. Thus, the text of Eustathius sometimes coincides with Ven. A², sometimes with Ven. B or Townl., and is sometimes supplementary to both. As an instance of the last-named alternative we may quote fr. 458, which is one of several examples of παράλειψις given by Eustathius as well as by the Paris MS 2766 of the thirteenth century³ in addition to those appearing in schol. BT. In the Odyssey Eustathius followed a similar course; but, since the existing scholia to the Odyssey are much less full and important than those to the Iliad, the value of the tradition represented by Eustathius becomes comparatively greater. Fr. 108 was found by Eustathius in his MS, amongst other illustrations of the word ἐπήβολος, as part of a note of Porphyrius which is also preserved in the Ὀμηρικὰ ζητήματα, whereas in our scholia⁴ the reference to Archippus⁵ is the only one of the post-Homeric quotations remaining⁶. To Porphyrius should probably be referred the interesting fr. 790, since it comes from an allegorizing original which explained Athena as φρόνησις and Poseidon as *ὕγρότης εὐψυχος*⁷. The origin of the material in Eustathius is sometimes obscured by the severe curtailment of the Odyssean scholia. Thus, his allusion to the Euryalus of Sophocles⁸ is part of a note rich in genealogical details attested by references to Hesiod, Aristotle, Hellanicus, and the Cyclic epics. We might well speculate how Eustathius became possessed of so much information drawn from ancient authorities, were it not that the bare skeleton of the earlier part of the note is preserved by schol. Q⁹.

¹ Nothing is known of these persons except their names, which are possibly fictitious. Apion cannot be the Alexandrian grammarian of that name.

² See frs. 43, 94, 1056.

³ Cramer, anecd. Par. III 274. But cod. 2679 (anecd. Par. III 5) was copied from Eustathius and is consequently worthless: cf. fr. 611. The same remark applies to cod. 2767 (frs. 776, 929). See Cohn, l.c. 1485.

⁴ Schol. EQR Hom. β 319.

⁵ fr. 37, 1687 K.

⁶ Porphyrius' note appears also in Etym. M. p. 357, 18, with all the Attic quotations except that from Sophocles.

⁷ The latter identification was Stoic: Cornut. 22, Cic. n.d. 1. 40.

⁸ 1 p. 145.

⁹ Eustath. Od. p. 1796, 35 ιστέον δὲ ὅτι γεναλογοῦσι Διὸς μὲν καὶ Εὐρυδίας Ἀρκέσιον· αὐτοῦ δὲ καὶ Χαλκομεδούσης Λαέρτην· τοῦ δὲ καὶ Ἀντικλείας Ὀδυσσεύα· οὗ καὶ

Suetonius.

Eustathius seldom referred to the scholia on other authors, so that it would be wrong to suppose that fr. 895 was borrowed by him from the scholia to Euripides. An examination of the context in Eustathius reveals that he has introduced into his commentary a long extract from the work of Suetonius περὶ τῶν παρ' Ἑλλησι παιδιῶν. The same origin is to be attributed to frs. 429 and 479. The name of the author is not given by Eustathius, but is mentioned by Suidas¹, who records the existence of another work by him entitled περὶ δυσφήμων λέξεων ἥτοι βλασφημιῶν καὶ πόθεν ἐκάστη. To the περὶ βλασφημιῶν Eustathius owed his acquaintance with frs. 720 and 885. It is at first sight surprising that these little-known works, written in Greek by a Roman historian of the age of Hadrian, should have survived and continued in use until the late Byzantine era. No less striking than the survival of Suetonius, who was, of course, the depository of earlier learning, is the appearance in Eustathius of a number of quotations ascribed to Aristophanes of Byzantium². The latter were held by Nauck in his monograph on Aristophanes to have been derived from the Homeric scholia; but the publication by Emmanuel Miller in 1868 of the contents of a remarkable MS formerly at Mt Athos³ showed that these as well as the extracts from Suetonius had a peculiar history. For the MS comprises, besides the collection of proverbs attributed to Zenobius, short excerpts from Zenodorus περὶ τῆς Ὀμήρου συνηθείας, from the λέξεις (περὶ ὀνομασίας ἡλικιῶν and so forth) of Aristophanes, and from the works of Suetonius already quoted. Each of them contains passages closely parallel to the text of Eustathius, although he names Aristophanes alone of the three authors, and even in his case sometimes substitutes φασί or κατὰ τοὺς παλαιούς. Thus the nature of the evidence leads irresistibly to the conclusion that Eustathius had before him a MS similar in character to the Athous, but giving the extracts in question in a much fuller form.

Πηνελόπης Τηλέμαχον· αὐτοῦ δὲ καὶ Πολυκάστης τῆς Νέστορος Περσέπτολιν, ὡς Ἡσίοδος (fr. 17)... Ἀριστοτέλης δὲ ἐν Ἰθακησίων πολιτείᾳ (fr. 506) καὶ Ἑλλάνικος δὲ (FHG I 64) Τηλέμαχον φασὶ Ναυσικάν γῆμαι τὴν Ἀλκινόου καὶ γεννήσαι τὸν Περσέπτολον· τινὲς δὲ καὶ τοιούτοις λόγοις ἐνευκαίρουσιν. ἐκ Κίρκης υἱὸς καθ' Ἡσίοδον (Theog. 1013) Ὀδυσσεὺς ἄγριος καὶ λατῶος, ἐκ δὲ Καλυψούης Ναυσίθοος καὶ Ναυσίνοος. ὁ δὲ τὴν Τηλεγόνοιαν γράψας Κυρηναῖος (EGF p. 58) ἐκ μὲν Καλυψούης Τηλέγονον υἱὸν Ὀδυσσεὺς ἀναγράφει ἢ Τηλέδαμον· ἐκ δὲ Πηνελόπης Τηλέμαχον καὶ Ἀρκεσίλαον· κατὰ δὲ Λυσίμαχον κτέ. Contrast with this schol. Q Hom. π 118 Ἀρκείσιος Εὐρυοδίας καὶ Διός, Λαέρτης δὲ Χαλκομεδούσης· Τηλεμάχου καὶ Πολυκάστης Περσέπτολιν. See also fr. 454.

¹ s.v. Τράγκυλλος.² See frs. 792, 793, 1062, 1069.³ Now Paris. suppl. Gr. 1164. See Miller, Mélanges de litt. gr. pp. 407—436.

Among the chief sources of Eustathius must be included the Atticist lexicons of Aelius Dionysius and Pausanias, but, owing to his unfortunate methods of reference already described, it has become a question of some difficulty and complexity to determine the extent of territory to be assigned to one or both of them, and in a less degree to distinguish the boundaries of their respective provinces. So far as Sophocles is concerned, the name of Aelius Dionysius is not given as authority for any of the fragments, whereas that of Pausanias occurs four times¹. But that is not all; for it is certain that many concealed references to them are introduced by the formulas φασί, *κατὰ τοὺς παλαιούς*², *ἐν ῥητορικῷ λεξικῷ*³, *ἐν κατὰ στοιχείου λεξικῷ*⁴, and the like. There is a large number of instances in which the tradition of the Atticists is repeated by Hesychius⁵, and various explanations have been given of their agreement. Thus, it has been argued both that Aelius Dionysius borrowed from Diogenian, and that Diogenian plundered the Atticists. But since Diogenian and the Atticists were contemporary writers, it is a more likely explanation that the coincidences result from their having used the same sources⁶. Eustathius is usually fuller than Hesychius⁷, and it is deserving of attention that he expressly adduces Didymus as his authority for the explanation of ἄργεμα, where Hesychius is silent⁸. Herennius Philo, to whom we shall return in another connexion, is mentioned by Eustathius six times,—twice as the author of the work περὶ

Aelius
Dionysius
and Pausanias.

Herennius
Philo.

¹ frs. 268, 272, 311, 877.

² Aelius Dionysius (p. 234 Schwabe) is considered to have been the source from which we get fr. 1087.

³ frs. 138, 748, 1093.

⁴ fr. 406.

⁵ The clearest instances are frs. 268, 311, 429, 596, 702, 877, 1006, 1046, 1084; but the list is not intended to be exhaustive of the points of contact between Hesychius and Eustathius.

⁶ Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa v 990.

⁷ See especially fr. 1046.

⁸ fr. 233.

διαφόρων σηματομενών. This book, which survived until the late Byzantine age, was the source of various lexicons of synonyms which were current under different names; and that such was the history of the extant lexicon of Ammonius περὶ ὁμοίων καὶ διαφόρων λέξεων is shown by its agreement with the fragments of Herennius preserved by Eustathius. To Herennius, therefore, belongs the distinction between ἐσχάρα and βωμός which occasioned the quotation of fr. 730¹, and the record of ἐπίφατος in fr. 1048. We are not here concerned with the relation of Eustathius to any of the technical grammarians except Herodian; and the coincidence of his text with the ἐπιτομή τῶν ὀνομαστικῶν κανόνων ἐκ τῶν Ἡρωδιανοῦ, edited by Hilgard in a Heidelberg program of 1887, supports the view that such excerpts rather than the complete treatises of Herodian were alone accessible to him².

ἐπι-
μερισμοί.

Before leaving the subject of Homeric exegesis, some reference must be made to the ἐπιμερισμοί, class-books of grammatical analysis applied to the text of the Homeric poems. The analytical process must, of course, have existed from the earliest days of literary study³, but in Byzantine times, as the circle of such studies continually narrowed, the professional teacher relied more and more upon the practical manuals variously assigned to the most eminent grammarians, and revised according to the needs of the age by their successors. Examples of such books have come down to us and some of them were published by J. A. Cramer in his anecdota. The earlier type was so arranged that the verbal explanations were made to follow the order of the text⁴, but we are more immediately concerned with the class in which the lemmas are arranged in alphabetical order. Its

¹ From the same source Eustathius derived the excerpt from Alexion quoted on fr. 564, 2.

² There is a reference to these excerpts in 1 p. 168 (Hilgard, p. 11, 3). The epitome was also published by Cramer (anecd. Ox. IV 333). A similar epitome περὶ ἀκρίτων ῥημάτων Αἰλίου Ἡρωδιανοῦ (ibid. IV 338) appears in the same program and connects Herodian with fr. 164.

³ Sext. Emp. math. I. 161 speaks of ὁ κατὰ γραμματικὴν μερισμός as requiring subtraction (τὸ ἀφαιρεῖν) and addition (τὸ προστιθέναι).

⁴ An example is cod. Coisl. 387 (tenth century) published in anecd. Paris. III 294—370.

most remarkable representative is the New College MS 298 (XIV cent.) published in vol. i of Cramer's anecdota Oxoniensia, which quotes five Sophoclean fragments¹ and is the sole authority for four of them. The grammatical sources most frequently named are Herodian and Aristonicus, and amongst others we find mention of Apollonius, Alexion, Heliodorus, Seleucus, and Tryphon. The latest in time are Philoponus, Orion, and Charax; and, since the name of Choeroboscus is absent, the collection may be assigned to the early part of the sixth century, between the dates of Charax and Choeroboscus². It is certain that these works were based largely on the results of Herodian's labours, and several of them circulated in his name, although their authenticity is open to question³.

The name of Herodian, known as ὁ τεχνικός for his eminence among them, introduces us to the technical grammarians. γραμματική was a comprehensive term, embracing the various branches of scholarship, and, although Aristarchus paid much attention to προσφθία and ὀρθογραφία, the great Alexandrians lived before the time when specialization had succeeded in cramping the grammarian's functions. Dionysius Thrax, the pupil of Aristarchus, was the father of grammar in the narrower sense of the term, although his activity was not limited within its bounds⁴. We are not concerned with the immediate development of the subject; for Apollonius Dyscolus of Alexandria, who belongs to the age of Hadrian, is the earliest of our authorities among the τεχνικοί. His influence upon posterity was extraordinary, and it is not too much to say that from his writings and those of his son Herodian the later world derived the whole of its grammatical knowledge⁵. His particular province was the functions of the different parts of speech, and he was the first writer of a treatise on syntax, large portions of which have been preserved⁶. He-

Technical
grammarians.

¹ frs. 114, 393, 521, 749, 750.

² Reitzenstein, Gesch. d. Etymol. 206.

³ Lentz, I xvii—xxxii. Reitzenstein, op. cit. 374.

⁴ Four fragments are quoted in the scholia to his τέχνη, one of which (fr. 751) certainly, and one (fr. 962) probably, belongs to the collection of Stephanus. Herodian is now ascertained to have been the authority followed in the citation of fr. 751.

⁵ Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa II 136.

⁶ From this book is quoted fr. 753. Fr. 471 comes from the separate work περί ἀντωνυμίας.

rodian, who was born at Alexandria, but lived subsequently at Rome and enjoyed the favour of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, made himself supreme in the domains of morphology and accentuation. His reputation, continually enhanced by the passage of his writings through the centuries, was earned by the skilful reconstruction and careful elaboration of the results which his predecessors had garnered, rather than by his success in establishing new principles of general application¹. Thus the περὶ ὀρθογραφίας was derived from Tryphon², and his great work, the καθολικὴ προσφθία in twenty-one books, was founded on the writings of Aristarchus, Tryphon, and Heracleides of Miletus³. The book is known to us chiefly through excerpts appropriated by Theodosius and Arcadius, and we are similarly placed in regard to all his other writings⁴, with the exception of the small tract περὶ μονήρους λέξεως, which has survived intact. No fewer than fifteen valuable and independent quotations from the lost plays of Sophocles are preserved in this little treatise⁵, and it is a remarkable fact that it contains no others from any tragic author, excepting two from Aeschylus and one from Aristias of Phlius⁶. One might not unreasonably infer that he either made for his own use a collection of these Sophoclean instances or had access to a list compiled by some one else⁷. The rhetorical treatise περὶ σχημάτων, from which is quoted the exceptionally interesting fr. 799, has nothing to do with Herodian the grammarian, although he is known to have made use of the same title⁸. There has been some controversy as to

¹ Reitzenstein, op. cit. 311.

² ibid. 302.

³ Sandys, p. 321.

⁴ His fragments were collected and edited by A. Lentz in 2 vols., Leipzig, 1867—1870. For the excerpts published by Hilgard after Cramer see p. lxx.

⁵ See Nauck's Index. In fr. 521 Herodian is, of course, the source of the other authorities, and in fr. 46 his tradition is independent of Hesychius and the rest. Two quotations (frs. 360, 586) are repeated in the περὶ διχρόνων (Cramer, anecd. Ox. III 282 ff.), perhaps an excerpt from the καθολικὴ προσφθία.

⁶ It is extremely unlikely that Herodian could have read Aristias, whose memory scarcely survived outside the πίνακες. See also on fr. 362.

⁷ It is worth notice that there is no quotation from any of the extant plays.

⁸ Christ-Schmid, op. cit. II⁵ p. 709; Schultz in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 970; Lehrs, Herodiani tria scripta emendatiora, p. 422. The writer clearly borrowed from a learned source: he quotes after our passage Eur. fr. 132, and shortly before it Archil. fr. 69 and Anacr. fr. 3.

the authenticity of the severely curtailed Φιλέταιρος, which is printed at the end of Pierson's edition of Moeris (pp. 431—453 of the 1759 edition). The little book is undoubtedly of the Atticist class, and has much in common with Phrynichus and the lexicographical sources of Pollux and Athenaeus. It is generally considered that Herodian had no affinity with the Atticists¹; and, although the possibility of its genuineness has been advocated by Reitzenstein², neither title nor contents appear to support his view³.

The edifice constructed by the labours of Herodian and his father was continually patched and repaired, enlarged or allowed partly to fall into decay, by the various workers who succeeded them; but the plan was never remodelled. It is needless to recite a list of these worthies, but mention must be made of Orus, who lived in the fifth century at Alexandria or Miletus or at both⁴, since the lexicon Messanenense edited by Rabe has been identified as a fragment of his work *περὶ ὀρθογραφίας*⁵. John Philoponus of Alexandria, who belonged to the age of Justinian and is well known for his commentaries on Aristotle,

¹ Some would except the συμπόσιον.

² Gesch. d. gr. Etym. pp. 377, 388—396.

³ Lehrs (p. 421) thought that here and there might be a trace of Herodian. See L. Cohn in Rh. Mus. XLIII 406, who is followed by Schultz, l.c. 973. It should be observed that the reference to fr. 606 is undoubtedly an abridgement of the fuller account preserved by Pollux and Athenaeus. Now, Aesch. fr. 211, which is referred to by Athenaeus and indicated in the Φιλέταιρος, is quoted precisely by Herodian π. μον. λέξ. p. 35, 19. At first sight this appears conclusive; but, when the various passages are examined with their context, it will be found that the surrounding conditions in the π. μον. λέξ. are entirely different from those in Pollux and Athenaeus, and that, whereas the lexicographers were dealing with vocabulary, Herodian was seeking to establish a rule of morphology. Cohn's theory, which Reitzenstein combats, that Atticism was derived from the Pergamene scholars, or more particularly from Alexander Polyhistor, is another matter altogether. In Nauck's Index Fontium the Φιλέταιρος is run together with ἐκ τῶν Ἡρωδιανοῦ also printed by Pierson (pp. 454—480) and in Lobeck's Phrynichus, p. 451 ff. That also is a work definitely Atticist in character.

⁴ Some authorities put him about two centuries earlier (see Christ-Schmid, op. cit. II² p. 885) on account of his work κατὰ Φρυνίχου κατὰ στοιχείων, sometimes identified with our Antiatlist (de Borries, Phryn. praep. soph. p. XXXIV), of which later. For Orus see also frs. 69, 333.

⁵ Reitzenstein, op. cit. p. 289 ff. The value of the quotations is due to the fact that Orus adapted an Atticist lexicon to his purpose.

quotes fr. 526, apparently from Orus. But he was himself a representative of the grammatical tradition, and fr. 461 appears in his extant work περὶ τῶν διαφόρων τουομένων καὶ διάφορα σημαινόντων. Five fragments are preserved by Priscian, who was a contemporary of the emperor Anastasius (491—518). Though a Latin grammarian, he depended largely upon Greek authorities, and acknowledges in his dedication that it was his intention to translate into Latin the rules of Apollonius Dyscolus and Herodian. In fact, much of the Institutes proves to be a reproduction of extant works of Apollonius and of the scholia to Dionysius Thrax¹. Fr. 880, which comes from the minor work de Terentii metris, is of interest as belonging to another branch of learning. Priscian's source was Heliodorus the metrician, now securely dated in the middle of the first century A.D., who quoted Sophocles' line from the commentaries of Seleucus, the Homeric scholar and contemporary of Tiberius². George Choeroboscus, perhaps the latest in date but by no means the least distinguished of the classical grammarians, occupied a professional chair at Constantinople in the early part of the sixth century. Several fragments of Sophocles are preserved in his lectures on the εἰσαγωγικοὶ κανόνες περὶ κλίσεως ὀνομάτων καὶ ῥημάτων of Theodosius of Alexandria, which were afterwards published from the notes of his pupils. There is no doubt that he depends upon lost works of Apollonius Dyscolus, Herodian, and Orus, but he seems to have used them only in intermediate sources, especially the writings of Philoponus and the grammarian Zenobius³. Choeroboscus is also our chief authority for two quotations drawn from his commentary on the Enchiridion of Hephaestion⁴, in which he represents the tradition of the ¹ Teuffel-Schwabe, tr. Warr, II p. 523. The eighteenth book of the Institutes corresponds to the third of Apollonius περὶ συντάξεως: Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa II 139. Bekker's third lexicon (anecd. 117—180) may be mentioned in this connexion: see frs. 696, 739. In its present shape it is very late, as the quotations show; but it also contains old material and was originally based on collections made from the speeches of Demosthenes and Isocrates.

² Hense in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 28, Susemihl, op. cit. II 22621.

³ Reitzenstein, op. cit. 361.

⁴ Now published in full in Consbruch's Hephaestion, pp. 177—254. Parts of it taken from the inferior codex Suibantianus appeared in Gaisford's posthumous edition ancient metrical learning descended from Aristophanes of Byzantium.

The influence of the paroemiographical tradition has been noticed in relation to the scholia on Pindar and Plato; and the sources employed by these writers will next be described. It is unfortunate that the proverbial corpus is still accessible only in the edition of von Leutsch and Schneidewin published at Göttingen in 1839¹. For the publication by Emmanuel Miller of the Athoan MS mentioned above² threw an entirely new light on the history of these collections. It has been shown by Otto Crusius³ that the vulgate MSS used by the editors of the corpus represent later collections made in alphabetical order, and containing either 552 proverbs attributed to Zenobius or about 1000 without an editor's name⁴. But, though these MSS still have their value in supplying the gaps in our knowledge of the earlier corpus, it is certain that the Athoan and other MSS which have since been found to belong to the same group represent a more primitive attempt to form a corpus in which the proverbs of Zenobius were retained in their original order. In the archetype of these MSS the corpus was divided into five parts, of which the first three contained the proverbs of Zenobius, the fourth those passing by the name of Plutarch and entitled *περὶ τῶν παρ' Ἀλεξανδρεῦσι παροιμιῶν*⁵, and the fifth a collection (1855). Hoerschelmann (Rh. Mus. XXXVI 300) was the first to recognize the authorship of Choeroboscus, since confirmed by the heading of cod. R. The two passages of Sophocles quoted by Choeroboscus (frs. 240, 795) are adduced in the same connexion by the Anonymus Ambrosianus de re metrica edited by W. Studemund in Schoell and Studemund's anecdota varia, I pp. 211—256. I am not aware that the relation of the anonymous writer to Choeroboscus has been investigated.

¹ This book, which is itself not easy to procure, superseded for practical purposes the edition of Gaisford (Oxford, 1836). In the present work, except where for special reasons it has been necessary to refer to Miller's Mélanges, the notation of the Göttingen corpus has been preserved in preference to the numbers of the Athoan and other MSS.

² p. lxviii.

³ Analecta crit. ad paroem. Gr. (Leipzig, 1883), p. 16 ff.

⁴ The Paris MS 3070^b (XII cent.) is the chief representative of the former class, and the Bodleian (XV cent.) of the latter. Gaisford's edition is still valuable for its reproduction of the Bodleian; for the Göttingen editors transferred to an Appendix proverbiorum (1 379—467) only such proverbs belonging to the anonymous collection as were not found in the Zenobian.

⁵ Fragments separately edited by O. Crusius, Leipzig, 1887.

made by an unknown sophist at a late date for use in the rhetorical schools. A reference to Nauck's Index Fontium will show that Zenobius—even within the limits of the Göttingen corpus¹—is by far the most important of the paroemiographers as a source of quotations from tragedy; and although Macarius, Gregory of Cyprus, and Apostolius are not entirely valueless as witnesses to the tradition, they belong essentially to the same group, and do not represent an early collection independent of Zenobius. The same remark applies to the collection of 776 Zenobian proverbs which passes by the name of Diogenian but has nothing whatever to do with the lexicographer of that name². Zenobius, the author of the collection which lies at the base of all extant records, was a sophist who lived in the reign of Hadrian, and his work is described by Suidas as ἐπιτομή τῶν παροιμιῶν Διδύμου καὶ Ταρραίου ἐν βιβλίοις γ'. Lucillus Tarrhaeus we have already encountered as one of those responsible for the scholia to Apollonius Rhodius; but, though materials are lacking to determine the exact date of his literary labours³, the character of the two passages where he is quoted verbatim, apart from the fact that, while Didymus wrote in thirteen books, Tarrhaeus as well as Zenobius wrote in three⁴, shows that Tarrhaeus cannot have been the intermediate source between Didymus and Zenobius⁵. We must rather regard Didymus, with whose methods we are now familiar, as having provided Zenobius with the bulk of his material and especially with his quotations, while additions of moderate length were made from the stories relating to various localities collected by Tarrhaeus in the course of his travels. Thus we have seen that Didymus rather than Tarrhaeus was the source of fr. 160⁶, and the same is doubtless true of the remainder of our fragments,

¹ It should be remembered that the Appendix proverbiorum is also Zenobian.

² Their ascription to Diogenian is explained by Crusius, Anal. p. 23. See also Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa v 783.

³ C. Mueller (FHG IV 440), who has collected all the notices relating to him, makes him a little older than Didymus or else his contemporary.

⁴ Helladius ap. Phot. bibl. p. 530^a 10.

⁵ Crusius, op. cit. p. 93 f.

⁶ See p. lxiv. His name is expressly recorded in connexion with fr. 98r. For fr. 811 see Crusius, p. 78; and for fr. 37 ib. p. 142.

although his authority cannot in every case be directly traced. Didymus, of course, made his collection from the earlier writers who had occupied themselves with the investigation of proverbs either current in speech or recorded in literature. Of these the most important were Aristotle, Theophrastus, Clearchus, Demon, Chrysippus, Aristophanes of Byzantium, Dionysodorus of Troezen, and Aristides. But Didymus was not merely a compiler: while he brought together the explanations previously given, he exercised his judgement freely in selecting from amongst them, or in rejecting them all in favour of another suggested by his own researches. Hence the fact that Zenobius often records a series of explanatory glosses, although the names of their advocates are seldom preserved¹. Thus Aristophanes of Byzantium, whose name is recorded in connexion with fr. 1044², and who, according to the reasonable inference of Crusius, was the source of fr. 198³, was rebuked by Didymus for charging the old poets with plagiarism⁴. Fr. 406 was one of the proverbs explained by Chrysippus⁵; and Demon, who belonged to the end of the fourth or beginning of the third century, certainly discussed the proverb Σαρδόνιος γέλως, although he is not the source to which we owe the reference to the *Daedalus*⁶.

We pass to the lexicographers, the most copious, if not the most fruitful source of our information. The supreme importance of Hesychius in relation to the tragedians can easily be measured by consulting the references to him in Nauck's Index; but the history of the development which explains the composition of his work has been treated in the preceding section, and sundry explanations bearing on other lexicographers have already been given and need not be repeated here. Aristophanes of Byzantium was the founder of Greek lexicography; and his immediate followers, adhering strictly to his example, confined their efforts to the compilation of lists (γλῶσσαι or λέξεις), not necessarily alphabetical, of the words and phrases current in a particular branch of literature or appropriate to a particular art.

¹ For examples see Zenob. 5. 85 (fr. 160), 6. 11 (fr. 908).

² Zenob. 3. 63.

³ Anal. p. 150.

⁴ ibid. p. 153.

⁵ Arnim III p. 202; Crusius, op. cit. p. 82.

⁶ See p. lxiv.

An early example was the γλῶσσαι of Nicander, frequently quoted by Athenaeus, which seems to have been intended to explain obscure terms of local currency; another, also familiar to readers of Athenaeus, was the ὀψαρτυτικαὶ λέξεις of Artemidorus; and several collections of dialectical and literary words were made by Tryphon. A favourite subject was, of course, the explanation of Homeric γλῶσσαι, in which all subsequent workers drew largely upon the labours of Aristarchus. The extant lexicon of Apollonius has already been mentioned in this connexion¹. The συναγωγή τῶν παρ' Ἱπποκράτει λέξεων of Erotian is one of the most valuable remnants of Greek lexicography, and alone preserves a number of tragic fragments, though often, unfortunately, in a corrupt form. The author belonged to the second half of the first century, and his book was dedicated to Andromachus, the emperor Nero's physician. His chief source was the Hippocratean glossary of Baccheius of Tanagra (c. 200 B.C.), which is quoted 64 times, and through him he derived much grammatical learning, including many quotations from the poets², from the λέξεις of Aristophanes of Byzantium³. But Erotian also relied on other authorities, amongst whom Heracleides of Tarentum (c. 75 B.C.), the author of a grammatical treatise in three books πρὸς Βακχεῖον περὶ τῶν Ἱπποκράτους λέξεων⁴, deserves special mention. The coincidence of Hesychius and Erotian in fr. 550 is due to the fact that Erotian was amongst the authorities consulted by Diogenian⁵. An explanation of the greater fullness of Hesychius is to be found in the condition of our ¹ See p. lxxv. Although in frs. 729, 1092 Apollonius gives more than Hesychius, a fuller version is usually preserved by Hesychius and other Byzantines. Fragments of such a version were published from an Egyptian papyrus by E. W. B. Nicholson in C. R. xi 390.

² Erotian p. 31, 12 (of Baccheius) πολλὰς παραθέμενον εἰς τοῦτο μαρτυρίας ποιητῶν.

³ His influence can be established in other passages than the seven or eight where he is cited by name. For the use made of him by Baccheius see Klein's Erotian, p. xxiv.

⁴ Erotian, p. 22, 19; 32, 2. The date of Heracleides was wrongly given (after authorities now obsolete) in the n. on fr. 236. But Erotian, p. 32, 2, has been strangely misinterpreted; for, though Klein's statement (p. xxviii) is quite clear, Wellmann (in Pauly-Wissowa II 149, 2790) twice makes Apollonius of Citium the author of the three books against Baccheius.

⁵ So Cohn infers from the statement in the introductory letter to Eulogius that Diogenian collected τὰς παρὰ τοῖς λατοῖς λέξεις (Pauly-Wissowa VII 547).

text of Erotian, which has been proved by Daremberg's discovery of extracts from Erotian among the Vatican scholia to Hippocrates¹ to be a mangled abridgement of the original work. Aristophanes' collection of Ἀττικά λέξεις was put together with the object of elucidating the sense in which they were employed by classical authors; and we may account in the same way for the similar titles found amongst the writings attributed to Crates of Mallus, Demetrius Ixion, Philemon, and others. But the Ἀττικά λέξεις of Dorotheus, of which Athenaeus quotes the 108th book², belonged to the class of encyclopaedic compilations which were characteristic of the first century A.D., and of which the joint work of Pamphilus and Zopyrion was the most famous specimen. The earliest representative of Atticism in the narrower and stricter sense, i.e. the school which aimed at the maintenance of a pure Attic style in contemporary literature and conducted its researches into classical usage with this express purpose in view, was Irenaeus, the pupil of Heliodorus the metrician³, known also by the Latinized name Minucius Pacatus. This tendency appears clearly in a fragment of Irenaeus quoted by Socrates, the ecclesiastical historian of the fifth century, in which the philosophical meaning of ὑπόστασις is condemned as βάρβαρον, because the word was used by Sophocles as equivalent to ἐνέδρα⁴. Aelius Dionysius, who lived in the age of Hadrian, wrote Ἀττικά ὀνόματα in five books, and published two editions, both of which were recognized by Eustathius⁵. The work was well known to Photius, who gives the above particulars in his *bibliotheca*⁶, and its influence upon Byzantine lexicography was very extensive. Pausanias, a Syrian and a contemporary of Galen, wrote a similar work, which in the time of Photius was regarded as a companion volume to the earlier lexicon, and was bound up with it accordingly⁷. The difficulty of distinguishing lexicons.

Atticist

¹ Klein, p. xvii ff.

² 329 D, where the title is given as λέξεων συναγωγή.

³ See p. lxxiv. The same date is indicated by the fact that Erotian quoted him (p. 25, 3).

⁴ fr. 719.

⁵ Od. p. 1944, 8; p. 1958, 1.

⁶ cod. 152.

⁷ Phot. bibl. cod. 153 ἀνεγνώσθη δὲ ἐν τῷ αὐτῷ τεύχει.

them has been increased, as we have seen, by the carelessness of Eustathius; but in general it may be inferred that Aelius Dionysius was more nearly concerned with questions of form and expression, whereas Pausanias dealt with the technicalities relating to public and private antiquities, and especially with the explanation of proverbs¹. Though the general line of their tradition is free from doubt, the identity of the sources actually followed is often obscure; for it is uncertain how much they took direct from Aristophanes of Byzantium, or how much from Didymus, Pamphilus, and Irenaeus. Their relation to Diogenian has already been considered². In spite of the difficulty involved in tracing the influence of lost works, Eustathius has revealed enough to enable us to identify them as one of the chief sources followed by Photius in his lexicon, and to establish their claim to the ownership of a number of glosses in the sixth lexicon included in Bekker's *anecdota*³. Evidence bearing on both these points will be found in the glosses which contain some of the Sophoclean fragments⁴. The survival of part of his work has made Phrynichus the best known of the Atticists to modern scholars. He lived in the latter half of the second century, and his great work the σοφιστικὴ προπαρασκευὴ was composed in thirty-seven books. With the exception of the fragments which can be recovered from other texts, the only part which has come down to us is the extract (ἐκ τῶν Φρυνίχου τοῦ Ἀραβίου τῆς σοφιστικῆς προπαρασκευῆς) preserved in the codex Coislinianus 345, and published as the first lexicon in Bekker's anecdota (pp. 1—74). It has recently been re-edited by J. de Borries⁵, together with a collection of the fragments. Much better

¹ E. Schwabe in his edition of their fragments (Leipzig, 1890) made no attempt to distinguish between the two writers.

² p. lxix.

³ pp. 319—476. It is entitled συναγωγή λέξεων χρησίμων ἐκ διαφόρων σοφῶν τε καὶ ῥητόρων πολλῶν. The part published by Bekker only covers the letter α. The name of Dionysius occurs at p. 362, 3.

⁴ For Photius see frs. 1087, 1093. The name of Pausanias appears in connexion with frs. 268, 877, and may perhaps be inferred in relation to fr. 420. ῥητορικὸν λεξικόν is quoted for frs. 138, 748; and οἱ παλαιοὶ (fr. 994) is probably Aelius Dionysius.

⁵ Leipzig, 1911. The book is unfortunately disfigured by numerous errors, and many of the fragments are assigned to Phrynichus on unconvincing grounds.

known, however, owing to the editions of Lobeck and Rutherford, is his earlier and shorter work in two books, which was entitled ἐκλογή ῥημάτων καὶ ὀνομάτων Ἀττικῶν. Phrynichus belonged to the severest school of Atticism, and framed his canons in accordance with the usage of Aristophanes, Thucydides, Plato, and Demosthenes; so that his appeals to Sophocles were occasional in character, when examples of the poetic style were introduced by way of illustration¹. The influence of Phrynichus upon his successors is recognizable for us chiefly in Bekker's sixth lexicon, where his name is quoted more frequently than in any other ancient document², and in Photius. This relationship has been much more clearly established since the recovery of the early part of Photius, to be mentioned later³. Phrynichus was by no means a mere copyist or epitomator; he was diligent in collecting material from the sources available to him, and he exercised an independent judgement in the general inferences which he drew from it. His eminence is shown by his rivalry with Julius Pollux for the favour of the emperor Commodus⁴, although he failed in his candidature for the professorial chair at Athens which was given to Pollux. But it is altogether unreasonable to suppose that he went so far as to gather most of his illustrations directly from the pages of his Attic models⁵; for we cannot believe that he discarded the labours of his predecessors any more than a modern scholar would refuse to avail himself of the help of indexes and lexicons. Thus, it is highly probable that he profited by the work of Irenaeus περὶ τῆς Ἀλεξανδρέων διαλέκτου, in which an attempt was made to show that the Alexandrian usage was the direct descendant of the Attic⁶. But we are not left to rely upon conjecture, since there is direct evidence that he used the lexicons of Diogenian and

¹ frs. 128 and 1064, the only two from the ἐκλογή, illustrate this point.

² fr. 357 is a good example.

³ No less than nineteen of de Borries's fragments contain references to Sophocles. But several of these (frs. 53, 68, 133, 134, 146, 244) are of uncertain origin.

⁴ Scarcely veiled instances of the controversy will be found in Rutherford's edition at pp. 157, 208, 251, 267, 321.

⁵ As de Borries seems to suggest on pp. XII, XXIII, though he subsequently modifies the statement (p. XXVI).

⁶ Rutherford, p. 479; de Borries, p. XXVI.

Aelius Dionysius¹. Helladius, the author of a miscellany of useful information composed in verse, who belongs to the early part of the fourth century, survives in the prose version preserved by Photius in his bibliotheca. He has so many points of contact with Phrynichus that the σοφιστικὴ προπαρασκευὴ has sometimes been regarded as the sole source of his grammatical information; but the conclusion is not generally accepted². The Antiatticist, the second in order of Bekker's lexicons³, represents a reaction against the severest school of Atticism, and was written with the object of showing that numerous words and phrases which had passed under the ban, were in fact employed by Attic writers of the best period. The authorship is quite uncertain, but it was probably first put together before the time of Orus, to whom Ritschl and others have assigned it⁴. The author's method was to take illustrations from earlier grammarians of repute, and to quote the reference to the ancient text. It has been argued that his chief source was the Ἀπτικάι λέξεις of Aristophanes of Byzantium⁵; and several of our glosses show points of contact with Diogenian⁶ and Herodian⁷. There are two cases in our collection⁸ showing an unexpected agreement with Phrynichus, but these may be due to the mutilation of our text. It should be observed that the Antiatticist quotes twenty-five fragments from Sophocles as against twelve taken from Euripides and four from Aeschylus. Just as Euripides was for obvious reasons the favourite of the anthologists, so Sophocles, not because of any preference based on literary grounds, but owing to the character of his diction, was the tragic model selected by the γραμματικοί.

¹ Schol. Hermog. ap. Walz, Rhet. Gr. v 486 (praef. soph. p. 115, 23 de B.). For Aelius Dionysius see also Rutherford, pp. 132, 209.

² Gudeman in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 101. There is a coincidence with Phrynichus in fr. 811, but not in fr. 734.

³ Bekk. anecd. pp. 75—116.

⁴ Christ-Schmid, op. cit. II⁵ p. 696; de Borries, p. xxxv. Our version is clearly an epitome.

⁵ See L. Cohn in Jahrb. f. cl. Philol. Suppl. XII 292. Observe the agreement of p. 91, 16 with Ar. Byz. ap. Eustath. Od. p. 1761, 31.

⁶ frs. 169, 517, 616.

⁷ frs. 280, 518, 612.

⁸ frs. 408, 669.

The lexicons hitherto discussed were known among the Byzantines as 'rhetorical' owing to their subservience to practical needs, but there is another class more properly so called which had for its object the elucidation of the Attic orators. We are chiefly concerned with Harpocraton, whose ultimate sources were the commentaries of Didymus¹ on the orators, and the Ἀτθίδες composed by various historians. He seems to have employed immediately the same onomasticon which was epitomized in Bekker's fifth lexicon². Harpocraton is usually identified with the teacher of the emperor L. Verus, although some authorities place him as early as the reign of Tiberius. The citation of fr. 502 is the occasion of a remarkably puzzling coincidence between Harpocraton and Athenaeus. Both texts have been confused by compression, but in a different way; and, according to a recent explanation, it appears that the codex of Harpocraton was interpolated from Athenaeus at a time when the Deipnosophists existed in a fuller form than is represented by the Marcianus³. Claudius Casilo, who, according to Nauck's conjecture⁴, was a sophist of the fourth century, is nearly related to Harpocraton. The fragments published by Miller from the Athous⁵ bear a close resemblance to the glosses in the margin of the Cambridge Harpocraton⁶, and it is possible that Claudius Casilo, whoever he was, was also the editor of that collection.

Julius Pollux, the rival of Phrynichus, whose ὀνομαστικόν in Pollux.

¹ One of the new fragments (fr. 510) comes from a papyrus containing a portion of Didymus' commentary on Demosthenes.

² Λέξεις ῥητορικαί: Bekk. anecd. pp. 195—318. For an example see fr. 449, originally attached to a passage in Lysias.

³ See H. Schultz in Pauly-Wissowa VII 2415. The problem is too intricate for discussion here, since it has no bearing on the text of Sophocles, unless we infer that Harpocraton's πέρην should be rejected in v. 3. But, though it is held that Harpocraton was interpolated from Athenaeus, so that the authority of the latter's text would be superior, it will be observed that on Schultz's hypothesis the accidental substitution of ἀκρην for πέρην may have been due to the epitomator of the Deipnosophists.

⁴ See L. Cohn in Pauly-Wissowa Suppl. I 318.

⁵ Mélanges, p. 397 f.

⁶ The lex. Cant. was first edited by Dobree, and published as an Appendix to Porson's Photius.

ten books published between 166 and 176 A.D. is still extant, was an Atticist of the milder type. He admitted much that Aelius Dionysius and Phrynichus had rejected; for it was his object to construct a complete vocabulary of Attic names arranged according to subject-matter. But, while following the precedent set by Telephus¹ in his alphabetical περὶ χρήσεως, ἥτοι ὀνομάτων ἐσθῆτος καὶ τῶν ἄλλων οἷς χρῶμεθα, he professes to aim not so much at comprehensiveness as at purity of diction². He made use of various sources in the composition of the different books: in the preface to the seventh book he speaks of the numerous writings, both verse and prose, which he has consulted, and in those to the ninth and tenth books he refers to the disappointing character of the information to be gathered from the ὀνομαστικόν of Gorgias³ and the σκευοφορικός of Eratosthenes. Thus in the second book he followed the anatomical treatise of Rufus Ephesius⁴, and his close agreement with Athenaeus in the passage from which fr. 241 is taken probably indicates that Pollux drew from Juba's θεατρικὴ ἱστορία or from the monograph περὶ αὐλῶν καὶ ὀργάνων constituting the third book of Tryphon's περὶ ὀνομασιῶν. The fragments of Sophocles comprise some 36 for which Pollux is our sole authority, and 15 in which he is supported by Hesychius either alone or with others. Fr. 877 shows that the quotation ultimately goes back to the common source of Pausanias and Diogenian; in all probability to Didymus, whose influence can be detected in regard to frs. 11, 36, and 482. Fr. 89, if not also fr. 734, goes back to Aristophanes of Byzantium; and the same writer's work περὶ προσώπων was probably the source of Pollux 4. 133—154, from which we learn interesting details respecting the masks worn by the actors taking the parts of Thamyras and Tyro⁵.

Stephen of Byzantium.

It has already been mentioned⁶ that Eustathius quotes a work on synonyms by Herennius Philo of Byblus, whose period of activity was late in the first or early in the second century.

¹ Suid. s.v.

² 1. 2 πεφιλοτίμηται οὐ τοσοῦτον εἰς πλῆθος ὅσον εἰς κάλλους ἐκλογὴν.

³ The identity of this writer is doubtful: Susemihl, II 501181.

⁴ See p. lviii.

⁵ I p. 177, II p. 271.

⁶ p. lxx.

But another of his works, which was entitled περὶ πόλεων καὶ οὗς ἐκάστη αὐτῶν ἐνδόξους ἤνεγκε in 30 books, is of much greater importance, since it was the principal source followed by Stephanus of Byzantium (c. 530 A.D.), who even in the extant epitome of his ethnica mentions Philo's name 33 times. From the fact that Apollodorus is mentioned by Stephanus 82 times and Artemidorus about 80¹, it has been inferred that both were extensively used by Herennius. To these authorities we should at least add Hecataeus and Alexander Polyhistor, whose names occur 300 and 100 times respectively. The position of Strabo (cited 200 times) is more doubtful, since Herennius would have no occasion to follow the copy when he had access to the originals. Stephanus, of course, did not follow Herennius exclusively; but in matters of etymology and προσῳδία had recourse to Herodian (cited 80 times) and Orus (cited 14 times)². An examination of the context in which the quotations from Sophocles occur, favours the conclusion that the majority of them reached Stephanus through Herodian.

A rhetorical lexicon attributed to the Patriarch Cyril of Alexandria exists in numerous MSS exhibiting various recensions, but has never been edited except in extracts arbitrarily selected³. In these circumstances neither the date of its composition nor the sources from which it was derived have been ascertained, although it is admitted to have played an important part in the successive developments of Byzantine lexicography. Thus, a Cyril-glossary was the basis of the συναγωγή λέξεων χρησίμων published from cod. Coislin. 345 in Bachmann's *anecdota*⁴. The glosses beginning with a and taken from the same MS had already appeared as the sixth lexicon comprised in

¹ For these authors see p. lii. It is hardly possible to place the Sophoclean fragments; but one might guess that fr. 579 came from Apollodorus. It should of course be remembered that Stephanus exists for the most part only in an epitome. For a specimen of the fuller text see on fr. 460.

² The above facts are taken from Gudeman's article in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 654 ff.

³ See Cramer, anc. d. Par. IV 177—201 (frs. 390, 391). Fr. 175 comes from an extract published by Schow.

⁴ I 1—422. Except fr. 175, all the fragments appear also in Photius. Zonaras (fr. 118) is a Cyril-glossary with etymological additions.

Bekker's *anecdota*¹. The earlier condition of the first part of the συναγωγή which corresponds to that of the letters β—ω in Bachmann can be seen in the fragments relating to the letter α edited by Boysen from cod. Coislin. 347². An enlarged revision of the original συναγωγή, which, with abbreviations and interpolations, was incorporated by the writer of Bekker's sixth lexicon, was one of the chief sources of the well-known lexicon of the Patriarch Photius (c. 820—c. 891)³; but the main constituent has been enriched with numerous additions from other sources, especially Aelius Dionysius, Phrynichus⁴, Harpocration, and the lexicons to Homer and Plato. Photius announced that his purpose in contrast with Diogenian was the collection of λέξεις from prose writers, but in practice his quotations from the poets are scarcely less numerous. The lexicon of Photius is preserved only in the Cambridge codex Galeanus (xii cent.), which is seriously mutilated, especially in the earlier part. A certain portion of the early gaps has been supplied (a) from the Athenian MS 1083, which contains two short fragments published by Fredrich and Wentzel in 1896⁵, and (b) from the Berlin MS (cod. Berol. graec. vet. 22) of the late eleventh or early twelfth century, which contains the commencement of the lexicon and extends as far as the gloss ἀπαρνος. The latter, so far as it relates to Photius, was published by R. Reitzenstein in 1907 with the title Der Anfang des Lexicons des Photios. It has brought to light an extraordinarily rich increment of tragic and comic fragments, no less than 37 of which belong to Sophocles.

Suidas. The enlarged συναγωγή was also incorporated in the lexicon of Suidas (912—959), whose agreement with Photius is explained by their employment of a common source. Suidas, of course,

¹ See p. lxxx3.

² Lexici Segueriani συναγωγή λέξεων χρησίων inscripti pars prima ex codice Coisliniano 347 edita, Marburg, 1891.

³ L. Cohn in Iwan Mueller's Handbuch, II p. 699. Reitzenstein, Photios, p. XLVI. Observe that the newly recovered opening of Photius is entitled Κνρίλλον και Φωτίου.

⁴ The recognition of the extent to which Photius was indebted to the σοφιστική προπαρασκευή was one of the chief surprises of the new Photius (Reitz. p. XXXIX). One of the best instances is the gloss ἀκοῦσαι ὀργῶ, in which fr. 25 is quoted.

⁵ Nachr. d. Kgl. Gesellschaft d. Wissenschaften, Göttingen, 1896, p. 309 ff. The glosses comprised are Ἀβραμῆος—ἀγάσσει and ἀγκιστρῆς—Ἀδράστεια.

amassed much material of a different character, but we are not concerned with the historical and biographical articles, owing to which his work bears some resemblance to a modern encyclopaedia. He also borrowed many of his glosses on points of grammar and lexicography from the paroemiographers and from the scholia to Aristophanes, Sophocles, and Thucydides¹.

A few words must be given to the Etymologica. The etymo-<sup>Etymologica.</sup> logical speculations of the Stoics, especially of Chrysippus, were contested by the Alexandrian grammarians of the Roman period, and above all by Philoxenus, a contemporary of Varro², and Tryphon, who together developed the formal classification of words as παραγωγαί ranged under their respective πρωτότυπα. The earliest etymological lexicon known to us was compiled by Orion in the first half of the fifth century, and is still partially extant in an abbreviated form. Besides Philoxenus, to whom he clearly owed fr. 621, the predecessors to whom he most frequently refers are Heracleides, Herodian, and Soranus³. Several centuries later the reviving interest in classical literature shown by some eminent people, as well as generally by the church, led to the appearance in successive redactions of encyclopaedic collections in which etymology was a leading feature. The oldest of these, now known as the Etymologicum genuinum in accordance with the suggestion of its discoverer Prof. R. Reitzenstein, was completed in the first half of the ninth century. It rests on the authority of two MSS of the tenth or eleventh century (cod. Vat. gr. 1818 and cod. Laur. S. Marci 304⁴), but has not been published⁵.

¹ The statement may be illustrated from frs. 15, 165, 508, 596, 885. Fr. 507 is interesting, since the gloss appears to come from Phrynichus (praep. soph. p. 43, 3 de B.). Fr. 623 is ultimately derived from Aristophanes of Byzantium, to whom all the ancient authorities on μασχαλισμός go back. The fact that Suidas alone mentions the Troilus shows that Phot. p. 249, 19 did not completely reproduce his immediate source. The same remark applies to fr. 1101. Fr. 960 perhaps came from the Platonic scholia. The history of fr. 1114 is obscure.

² See fr. 390.

³ A physician who belonged to the age of Trajan and Hadrian. The reference is to his ἐτυμολογίας τοῦ σώματος τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.

⁴ This is the Etym. Flor. Milleri, from which extracts were published by E. Miller in his Mélanges, p. 177.

⁵ Some of its readings have been separately published by Reitzenstein (see fr. 705) or communicated by him to others. Hence it has partially ousted the Etym. Al. in such books as Kaibel's Com. Gr. Fr. and Diels's Vorsokratiker.

Among its numerous sources may be mentioned Orus, Orion, Herodian περὶ παθῶν, and various annotated MSS of classical authors. The Etymologicum Gudianum, so called after a former owner of the MS from which the edition of Sturz (1818) was printed, was compiled independently of the genuinum, but from similar sources. It appears in three distinct recensions represented by various MSS¹, and has a very complex history which cannot be described here². The Etymologicum Magnum, which was edited by Gaisford in 1848, belongs to the early part of the twelfth century. The author took as the basis of his work a copy of the genuinum, which he describes as τὸ μέγα ἐτυμολογικόν, but he also made use of the Gudianum (τὸ ἄλλο ἐτυμολογικόν) and a number of additional authorities³.

Stobaeus.

The most important of all the sources in regard both to the number and to the character of the quotations preserved in it is the Anthology of John Stobaeus. His date can only be ascertained by reference to the authorities quoted, of whom Iamblichus is possibly the latest⁴; and, since he also shows no sign of Christian influence, it is unlikely that his collection was put together later than the fourth century. As known to Photius, the work was comprised in four books making two volumes (τεύχη)⁵; but owing to disintegration and confusion of its order in the middle ages it was treated as two separate works, distinguished as eclogae and florilegium. The eclogae is actually the first two books, considerably mutilated, of the original ἀνθολόγιον, while the third and fourth made up the so-called florilegium. The original form of the work, with the correct order of chapters and extracts, so far as it can be restored from the best copies, is only ¹ See fr. 789 (Etym. Sorb.), fr. 390 (Etym. Paris.).

² For further details respecting the chief Etymologica see Reitzenstein in Pauly-Wissowa VI 812 ff. It is important to observe that each scribe adds some particulars and alters others, so that the work is continually in flux. The first part of a new edition of the Etym. Gud. by Al. de Stefani has recently appeared.

³ The Etym. Voss. (Voss. gr. 20, XIII cent.) occasionally cited by Gaisford contains the so-called μεγάλη γραμματική, a reconstruction of yet another Etymologicum which passed by the name of Symeon (Reitzenstein, l.c. 816).

⁴ The supposed quotations from Hierocles the Neoplatonist really belong to Hierocles the Stoic, who lived in the reign of Hadrian (v. Arnim in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 1479).

⁵ Bibl. cod. 167.

to be found in the recent edition of Wachsmuth and Hense¹. Those who have followed the present discussion will not need to be assured that Stobaeus did not gather his select passages in the course of his own reading, although he may well have been responsible for the addition of some of the later extracts. He himself often refers to the Tomaria of a certain Aristonymus. A conclusive proof that Stobaeus made use of earlier anthologies was given by Diels² some forty years ago from the coincidence of his quotations with those which appear in the Christian apology addressed to Autolycus by Theophilus, bishop of Antioch (c. 180 A.D.)³. Exactly the same kind of coincidence has been observed in the case of Clement of Alexandria. Thus, it cannot be due to chance that three quotations on the same topic which appear in the same chapter of Stobaeus, and in close proximity to each other⁴, should be cited in immediate sequence by Clement, though one of them is attributed to Aeschylus with a significant addition⁵. But, though the existence of such anthologies is thus brought back to the second century A.D., and by reasonable inference to a much earlier date⁶, and, though Plato recommended the making of selections from the poets, so that extracts from their works might be committed to memory as an aid to moral instruction⁷, there is no express reference to their composition and no record of the names of their authors.

Only within very recent times has evidence come to light which reveals the tradition represented by Stobaeus as already current at least 600 years before his time. In the Journal of Early anthologies.

¹ Hense's concluding volume is still unpublished. The references to the vulgate of the Florilegium have been retained in the present edition as being more generally accessible, but Hense's pages have also been cited.

² Rh. Mus. xxx 172 ff.

³ Both assign fr. 229 to Aeschylus as well as to Sophocles. The clearest case is the ascription by Theophilus to Aeschylus as a single quotation of three distinct passages which have run together owing to the loss in the anthology of the lemma belonging to the two latter: see Stob. eccl. i. 3 p. 57, 4 ff. with Wachsmuth's notes. Cf. also frs. 961, 962.

⁴ Flor. 39. 11, 13, 14.

⁵ See on fr. 934. Points of contact between Stobaeus and Clement will be found in frs. 87, 929, 949. On their relation see Wilamowitz, Einleitung, p. 171.

⁶ Wilamowitz, l.c.

⁷ Plat. legg. 811 A.

Hellenic Studies for 1907¹ F. W. Hasluck published from an inscription, which was found at Kermasti in the Cyzicus district and is dated about 300 B.C., a long list of aphorisms, such as φίλοις βοήθει, θυμοῦ κράτει, ἄδिका φεύγε, and so forth, obviously intended for the moral edification of those who frequented the immediate neighbourhood. When the list is compared with the collection of the precepts of the Seven Wise Men attributed to Sosiades in Stob. flor. 3. 80, it is abundantly clear that the former, if not the original, is at any rate an early version of the latter². Even more remarkable in their relation to Stobaeus were the fragments of florilegia published in Berl. Klassiker-texte, V 2 pp. 123—130, from two papyri (Berl. 9772 and 9773) of the second century B.C. Thus 9773 not only contains the extracts 9 and 11 of Stob. flor. 69 next to each other though in the reverse order, but also the title ψόγος γυναικῶν, which is prefixed to the same chapter of Stobaeus. Though the text of Stobaeus may thus be shown to depend upon very ancient authority, it cannot be considered to possess the same weight as the text of an extant play which can be traced to the Alexandrian edition. In fact, when a comparison is possible between the two, the differences are often such that they cannot entirely be explained as the deliberate modifications of the anthologist made for the purpose of adapting his quotations to their place. In dealing with the Berlin fragments Wilamowitz suggested that the text of Euripides might have come from a bad actor's copy, while at the same time he pointed out the possibility that the anthology was constituted before the date of Aristophanes' edition³. But, whatever the defects of his text, Stobaeus is so precious a witness that one would willingly barter much of the lexicographic material for an increased supply from the anthologies. In this respect Euripides was more fortunate, as has already been mentioned. Apart from Stobaeus and his copyists the only extant authority in this department is the ἀνθολόγιον γυναικῶν addressed to the empress Eudocia by the grammarian

¹ xxvii 62 f.

² This was first pointed out by Diels in Sitzungsb. d. k. pr. Akad. 1907, p. 457. See also Vorsokr. II³ p. 214.

³ See also his Sappho u. Simonides, p. 270.

Orion (c. 440 A.D.), which for three fragments stands entirely alone¹.

§ 5. Bibliography.

The scholars of the centuries immediately following the revival of learning were occupied with weightier matters than the collection of the scattered remains of the ancient masters, which the nature of the texts then available would have made a task of exceptional difficulty. All the more credit is due to Casaubon for constructing, by way of excursus to Athen. 277 E², a catalogue of all the titles of Sophocles' plays of which he could find a record. Bentley once dreamed of the project of editing the fragments of all the Greek poets, and the Letter to Mill and the contributions to Graevius's Callimachus were foretastes of what he might have accomplished in this sphere. But it was not until the latter part of the eighteenth century that attention began to be directed to those of Sophocles in particular. In 1762 Benjamin Heath (1704—1766) published at the Clarendon Press a series of notes on Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, including (pp. 93—112) critical comments on a number of tragic fragments taken from Grotius's excerpts from Stobaeus³. A contribution of a similar kind was made by the well-known philologist Jonathan Toup (1713—1785) in his Epistola Critica addressed to Warburton and published in 1767; and in the same year appeared L. C. Valckenaer's Diatrise in Euripidis perditorum dramatum reliquias, which incidentally discussed several fragments of Sophocles. Valckenaer had in fact devoted much labour to these latter, and it is clear from the Preface of Brunck, their first editor, that the collection contained in his edition of Sophocles (1786) was largely indebted to the Dutch critic. Brunck also acknowledged his obligation to David Ruhnken, by whom a number of quotations was contributed from hitherto unedited lexicographical sources. The arrangement of the editio princeps was somewhat inconvenient. The plays in alphabetical order with most of the longer fragments attributed to them came first; then more than 100 fragments 'ex incertis tragoediis'; and lastly a number of glosses from the lexicographers arranged alphabetically as 'Lexicon Sophocleum,' and containing complete lines as well as isolated words and phrases. Nevertheless, Brunck's edition, which was reprinted several times, held the field for more than forty years, during which period little was done either for the increase of the collection or for the better understanding of the fragments which had been already printed. Mention should, however, be made of a paper by Blomfield in Mus. Crit. Cant. I (1826) 141—149, containing addenda to Brunck's collection and critical notes on several passages. Blomfield's results were incorporated by W. Dindorf, who, in his Poetae Scenici of 1830, was able by recasting Brunck's work to issue it in a much more convenient form with various corrections and enlargements. Dindorf acknowledged in his Preface that he had taken slight pains to improve the work by his own investigations, and lamented that there was no prospect of a new edition adequate to the needs of the time. Hasty and superficial as the book was, it shared the popularity which Dindorf's publications enjoyed for about half a century, and in its latest form, as represented in the fifth and greatly improved issue of the Poetae Scenici (1869), it is probably still in more general use than any other edition.

¹ frs. 228, 247, 302. What remains of Orion is only a scanty fragment, which was first edited by Schneidewin from a Vienna MS. It is also printed in Meineke's Stobaeus IV 249—266.

² It is reproduced in Schweighäuser's Athenaeus, IX pp. 27—52.

³ Dicta poetarum, quae in Eclogis tum in Florilegio Stobaeus adfert, recensuit... H. Grotius, Paris, 1623.

A new epoch in the progress of knowledge concerning the literary output of the Greek tragedians was opened by the publication in three volumes of F. G. Welcker's Die griechische Tragödien mit Rücksicht auf den epischen Cyclus geordnet, Bonn, 1839. This was an exhaustive examination of all the evidence which could be discovered bearing upon the literary history of the plays of the three great tragedians, and especially on the contents of their plots. The plays were arranged according to the order occupied by the events which they comprised in the series of the epic Cycle. Welcker's book is as readable to-day as when it was first printed. He had spared no exertion in sifting the whole of the data provided by the mythographical authorities, and in comparing them with the relevant indications of the tragic fragments. On the basis of this evidence the plots were reconstructed with remarkable acuteness; and the results, though necessarily often conjectural, can be checked, even where they fail to convince, by the openly displayed material of the sources quoted. It should be added that the satyric plays had been separately treated by Welcker in an earlier work entitled Nachtrag zu die Aesch. Trilogie Prometheus, Frankfurt, 1826. Welcker's work gave an extraordinary impulse to philological activity, and the following years witnessed the appearance of a number of critical papers in the various periodicals by Bergk, Meineke, Nauck, Schneidewin, and others, directed to the emendation and elucidation of the tragic texts. The influence of Welcker is more directly visible in editions of the tragic fragments which began to appear in the course of the following decade. This applies to F. H. Bothe's Poetarum scenicorum Graecorum quorum integra opera supersunt Fragmenta, Lipsiae, 1844—1846¹, to F. W. Wagner's Poetarum tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, Vratislaviae, 1844—1852, and to E. A. I. Ahrens's edition of the fragments of Aeschylus and Sophocles in the Didot series (1842), which was prepared with the avowed object of popularizing Welcker's results. J. A. Hartung's Sophokles' Fragmente (1851) was a more ambitious effort upon the same lines, but his speculations, though sometimes ingenious, are seldom such as to command assent.

In 1856 appeared the first edition of A. Nauck's Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta, which was the earliest systematic attempt to produce an edition acceptable to the requirements of modern criticism. His aim was critical rather than explanatory, and one of his chief merits was the provision of accurate information concerning the textual data of the sources. Even where these had not been satisfactorily edited, as was the case with Stobaeus, Nauck succeeded in procuring collations of the material readings of the best MSS. Nauck's second edition, enlarged and revised so as to include the latest available material, appeared in 1889, and has remained the indispensable foundation of all subsequent work. In the meantime Lewis Campbell had edited the fragments after Nauck in the second volume of his Sophocles (1881), excluding those which consist of single words or of very short phrases. Campbell contributed some useful notes, but did little to elucidate the difficulties which the fragments present; and he evidently considered that they did not demand the same measure of careful criticism which he applied to the text of the extant plays.

¹ In 1806 Bothe published an edition of Sophocles in 2 vols., in which the fragments were reproduced from Brunck. A second edition appeared in 1826. Neither this nor the later work is of much independent value.

In the course of the twenty-five years which have elapsed since the appearance of Nauck's second edition a considerable mass of fresh material has accrued, and the extraordinary development of the various branches of Classical learning which has taken place during that period, while it has thrown welcome light on many obscurities, has enormously increased the difficulty of focusing its results so far as they bear upon the scattered texts. There has been no fresh edition of the whole of the fragments; but, since the publication of the papyrus remains of the Ichneutae and Eurypylus in 1912, a convenient text entitled Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta papyracea nuper reperta has been edited by A. S. Hunt, and the additions to Sophocles brought to light in recent years have been collected and edited by E. Diehl as Supplementum Sophocleum, Bonn, 1913. The Ichneutae has been separately edited by N. Terzaghi, Firenze, 1913. There is also a German translation by C. Robert, Berlin [second ed.], 1913. The following list contains all the occasional contributions which have been consulted for the purpose of the present edition, as well as some marked by an asterisk which I have not had an opportunity of examining.

BAKHUYZEN, W. H. VAN DE SANDE. De parodia in comoediis Aristophanis. Utrecht, 1877.

BAMBERGER, F. Conjectaneorum in poetas Graecos capita duo. Braunschweig, 1841. [Reprinted in his Opuscula philologica: see pp. 163-165.]

BENECKE, E. F. M. Antimachus of Colophon. London, 1896. [On the Phaedra of Sophocles at p. 201.]

BERGK, Th. Commentatio de fragmentis Sophoclis. Lipsiae, 1833.

— De duodecim fragmentis Sophoclis. Marburg, 1843/4.

— Nachträge zu den Fragmenten des Sophokles. Zeitschrift für Altertumswissenschaft, XIII (1855), p. 108.

- BLASS, F. [On the Niobe.] Literarisches Zentralblatt, 1897, p. 334.
 — Rhein. Mus. LV 96-101.
- BLAYDES, F. H. M. Adversaria in Tragicorum Graecorum fragmenta. Halis Saxonum, 1894.
 — Adversaria in varios poetas Graecos et Latinos. Halis, 1898. [On Soph. frs. at pp. 158-165, 201.]
 — Spicilegium Tragicum. Halis, 1902. [On Soph. frs. pp. 156-163, 243.]
- BUCHERER, F. Zu Sophokles' Ichneutai. Berl. phil. Woch., 1912, 1107 f.
- BUECHELER, Fr. Coniectanea. Rhein. Mus. XXXIX 274.
- CAMPBELL, L. [Letter in reply to R. Ellis: v. infra.] American Journal of Philology, III 128.
- COBET, G. C. Collectanea Critica. [De nonnullis fragmentis Tragicorum, pp. 187-208.] Lugduni Batavorum, 1878.
- CONINGTON, J. Epistola critica de quibusdam Aeschyli Sophoclis Euripidis fragmentis. Oxford, 1852. [Reprinted in Miscellaneous Writings, 1872: see II pp. 455-457.]
 — Ad Tragicos Graecos. Hermes, II 142 ff.
- CRUSIUS, O. Der Sophokleische Dionysiskos. Rhein. Mus. XLVIII 153.
- DECHARME, P. Le Drame satyrique sans Satyres. Revue des Études grecques, XII (1899), pp. 290-299.
- DINDORF, W. Vermischte Aufsätze. Philologus, XII 188-192.
- DOBREE, P. P. Adversaria. Cambridge, 1843. II pp. 51-55.
- DUENTZER, H. Zu den Fragmenten des Sophokles. Philologus, III 136-138.
- EBERS, A. Ueber die Fabel der Aloidon. Zeitschrift f. Alterthumswissenschaft, IV 785-792.
- ELLIS, R. On the fragments of Sophocles and Euripides. Journal of Philology, IV 251-271.
 — On the fragments of Sophocles. American Journal of Philology, II 411 ff.
 — Blaydes's Adversaria in Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta. Hermathena, IX 144-154.
 — Some emendations of the Greek Tragic. Classical Review, IX 105.
- ENGELMANN, R. Archäologische Studien zu den Tragikern. Berlin, 1900.
- ENGEL, R. Zu Sophokles [fr. 88]. Rhein. Mus. XXIII 537 ff.
 — Adnotationes ad Tragicorum Graecorum fragmenta. Ostrovii, 1863.
- FOERSTER, R. Zum Laokoon des Sophokles. Verhandlungen der 40. Versammlung deutscher Philologen u. Schulmänner in Götting 1889 [pp. 432-438]. Leipzig, 1890.
- FRITZSCHE, F. V. Emendationes in Aristophanis fragmenta. De Sophoclis Niobe. Ind. lect. acad. Rostochi, 1836.
- GERCKE, A. Telegonie und Odyssee. Neue Jahrb. f. d. kl. Altertum, XV 313-333.
- GOMPERZ, Th. Zu den gr. Tragikern. Rhein. Mus. XIII 477 ff.
 — Beiträge zur Kritik u. Erklärung gr. Schriftsteller [pp. 4-15]. Wien, 1875.
 — Die Bruchstücke der gr. Tragiker und Cobets neueste kritische Manier. Wien, 1878.

- GOMPERZ, Th. Nachlese zu den Bruchstücken der gr. Tragiker [pp. 4-17]. Wien, 1888.
- HARRISON, J. E. Athene Ergane. Classical Review, VIII 270.
- Pandora's Box. Journal of Hellenic Studies, XX 99 ff.
- Sophocles Ichneutae Col. IX 1-7 and the δρώμενον of Kyllene and the Satyrs. Essays and Studies presented to William Ridgeway [pp. 136-152]. Cambridge, 1913.
- HAVERFIELD, F. A fragment of Sophocles. Classical Review, II 324.
- HAYMAN, H. Emendations of Sophocles. Proceedings of the Cambridge Philological Society, 1882, p. 30.
- HEADLAM, W. G. Various Conjectures I. Journal of Philology, XX 294-311.
- Various Conjectures III. Journal of Philology, XXIII 260-323.
- Critical Notes I. Tragicorum fragmenta ed. Nauck. Classical Review, XIII 3 ff.
- Emendations and Explanations. Journal of Philology, XXXI 8-10.
- HEIMSOETH, Fr. Kritische Studien zu den gr. Tragikern. Bonn, 1865.
- HENSE, O. Exercitationes Criticae. Halis, 1868.
- HERWERDEN, H. VAN. Exercitationes Criticae [pp. 10-30]. Hagae Comitum, 1862.
- Emendatur Sophocles ap. Stob. Flor. 26. 1. Mnemosyne, I 312.
- Ad poetas scenicos Graecorum. Mnem. VI 280-282.
- Epistola Critica ad Nauckium. Mnem. XVII 265-267.
- Ad Tragicos. Mnem. XX 432-434.
- Lucubrationes Sophocleae [pp. 77-83]. Trajecti ad Rhenum, 1887.
- Analecta Tragica. Appendix in Eur. Hel. [pp. 101-103]. Lugduni Batavorum, 1895.
- Ad tragicorum Graecorum fragmenta. Mélanges Henri Weil [pp. 179-191]. Paris, 1898.
- Novae Observationes ad Tragicorum Graecorum fragmenta. Rhein. Mus. LVIII 138.
- Varia ad Varios. Mnem. XXVII 390.
- HILLER, E. De Sophoclis Phaedra et de Euripidis Hippolyto priore. Liber miscell. philol. Bonn, 1864. p. 34 ff.
- HILLER V. GAERTRINGEN, F. De Graecorum fabulis ad Thraces pertinentibus. Berlin, 1886.
- HOLLAND, R. Die Sage von Daidalos und Ikaros. Progr. der Thomaschule in Leipzig, 1902.
- HOLZNER, E. Zu den Fragmenten des Sophokles. Wiener Studien, XVI 324-328.
- Zu den Fragmenten der griech. Tragiker. Philologus, LV 566-568.
- IMMISCH, O. Ad Sophoclis Epigonos. Philologus, XLVIII 554.
- Klaros [p. 180 ff.]. Jahrb. für cl. Philologie, Suppl. Bd XVII.
- Ein Sophokleischer Vers [fr. 768] und das Urtheil über Clitarchs Stil in der Schrift vom Erhabenen. Rhein. Mus. XLVIII 512-528.
- JEBB, R. C. Adversaria in Sophoclis fragmenta [p. 121 f.]. Album Gratulatorium in honorem Henrici van Herwerden. Trajecti ad Rhenum, 1902.

- KALKMANN, A. De Hippolytis Euripidis quaestiones novae. Bonn, 1882.
- KEIL, H. Sophokles [fr. 432]. Philologus, I 157 ff.
- KNAACK, G. Charnabon. Neue Jahrb. für Philologie, CXXXV 318, 800.
- KOCK, Th. Verisimilia. Jahrb. für cl. Philologie, Suppl. Bd VI.
- *KRAMER, A. De Pelopis fabula. Diss. Halle, 1886.
- KURFESS, A. De Sophoclis Indagatorum fontibus. Mnem. XLI 111 f.
- LUDWICH, A. Zu Herakleitos Homerischen Allegorien. Mit einem Anhang zu gr. Dichtern [Soph. fr. 391]. Rhein. Mus. XXXVII 434 ff.
- [On Soph. fr. 812.] Berl. phil. Woch., 1902, 766.
- MAAS, P. Zu den neuen Klassikertexten der Oxyrhynchos-Papyri (vol. IX). Berl. phil. Woch., 1912, 1075 ff.
- Review of Hunt's Tragicorum Graecorum Fragmenta Papyracea. Deutsche Literatur-Zeitung, 1912, 2781-2785.
- MADVIG, J. N. Emendationes per saturam. Philologus, I 670-677 [Reprinted in Opusc. acad. p. 699 ff.].
- Fragmenta aliquot poetarum Graecorum quae apud Athenaeum exstant emendata. Mélanges Graux, Paris, 1884, pp. 71-78.
- MARX, Fr. Die Zeit der Schrift vom Erhabenen. Wiener Studien, XX 169 ff. at p. 191 ff.
- MAYER, M. Mythistorica. 3 Tereus. Hermes, XXVII 489 ff.
- MEINEKE, A. Marginalien. Zeitschrift für Alterthumswissenschaft, I 293, ibid. III 1066, VIII 500.
- Zu den Fragmenten des Sophokles. Philologus, XIX 144.
- Miscellanea. Neue Jahrb. für Philologie, LXXXVII 369 ff.
- Miscellen. Philologus, XVII 558.
- MEKLER, S. Lectionum Graecarum specimen [fr. 88]. Wien, 1882.
- ποροσώτης [fr. 555]. Philologus, LIV 376.
- Lucubrationum capita quinque [fr. 432]. Progr. des Communal-Obergymn. in 19. Bezirke. Wien, 1895.
- Exegetisch-kritische Beiträge zu den Fragmenten der griech. Tragiker. Jahresb. d. Elisabeth-Gymnasiums in Wien, 1903.
- Bericht über die die griech. Tragiker betreffende Literatur der Jahre 1898-1902. Bursians Jahresbericht, CXXV 180-184, CXXIX 29-32.
- Bericht über die die griech. Tragiker betreffende Literatur der Jahre 1903-1907. Bursians Jahresbericht, CXLVII 95-123, 277 ff.
- MÜNSCHER, K. Zu Sophokles Ichneutae. Rhein. Mus. LXIX 170-190.
- NABER, S. A. Sophoclea. Mnem. IX pp. 241-244.
- NAUCK¹, A. Zu den Fragmenten der griech. Tragiker. Philologus, IV 538-543.
- Zu den Fragmenten der griech. Tragiker. Philologus, VI 384-401.
- Zu den Fragmenten der griech. Tragiker. Philologus, XII 193-196.
- * — Observationes criticae de tragicorum Graecorum fragmentis. Progr. Gymn. Joachim. Berolini, 1855.

¹ This is not a complete list of his published work on the Fragments; but, since his latest results are to be found in his second edition, it did not seem worth while to refer to all the scattered publications, which are partly superseded and often difficult of access.

- NAUCK, A. Zur Kritik griechischer Dichter. Neue Jahrb. für cl. Philologie, CV 803-807.
- Tragicæ dictionis index spectans ad Tragicorum Graecorum fragmenta. Petropoli, 1892. [The book contains an important supplement to the edition of the text: see especially pp. XI-XIV.]
- *NEUMANN, W. Die Entwicklung des Philoktet-Mythos mit besonderer Berücksichtigung seiner Behandlung durch Sophokles. Progr. des Gymn. Coburg, 1893.
- PAPABASILEIOS, G. A. διόρθωσις χωρίων Σοφοκλέους κτέ. Παρνασσός, X 513.
- κριτικαὶ παρατηρήσεις εἰς τὰ ἀποσπάσματα τῶν τραγικῶν. Ἀθηνᾶ, VI 65-73.
- PAPAGEORGIUS, P. N. κριτικὰ καὶ ἐρμηνευτικὰ εἰς τὰ ἀποσπάσματα τῶν Ἑλληνικῶν τραγικῶν ποιητῶν. Lipsiae, 1880.
- διορθώσεις εἰς τὰ ἀποσπάσματα τῶν τραγικῶν ποιητῶν. Ἀθηναῖον, IX 333 ff., 341 ff.
- Beiträge zur Erklärung und Kritik des Sophokles. Pars I. Jenae, 1883.
- *PAUCKER, C. Doppelpalladienraub nach den Laconerinnen des Soph. auf einer Vase von Armento. Mitau, 1851.
- PEARSON, A. C. Notes on Sophocles, Ichneutae and Eurypylus. Classical Review, XXVI 209-212.
- Αἰτναῖος κἀνθαρος. Classical Review, XXVIII 223 f.
- *PEPPMUELLER, R. In poetas Graecos [Soph. fr. 126]. Progr. d. Gymn. Seehausen i. A. Halle, 1887.
- PETERSEN, E. Andromeda. Journal of Hellenic Studies, XXIV 104-112.
- *— Atrous und Thyestes nach Sophocles. Progr. Dorpat, 1877.
- *PFLUGK, J. Schedae criticae. [In Sophocles Iphigeniam.] Gedani, 1835.
- PILLING, C. Quomodo Telephi fabulam et scriptores et artifices veteres tractaverint. Halae Saxonum, 1886.
- PORSON, R. Adversaria [p. 215 f.]. Cantabrigiae, 1812.
- POWELL, J. U. On Recent Discoveries. Classical Quarterly, IX 142 f.
- RABE, H. Lexicon Messanenae de iota ascripto. Rhein. Mus. XLVII 404-413.
- REITZENSTEIN, R. Inedita poetarum Graecarum fragmenta I, II. Ind. lect. acad. Rostoch., 1890/1, 1891/2.
- RIBBECK, O. Die römische Tragödie im Zeitalter der Republik. Leipzig, 1875.
- RIZZO, G. E. Studi archeologici sulla tragedia et sul ditirambo. Riv. di filologia classica, XXX 462 ff.
- Theaterdarstellung und Tragödienszene. Jahreshefte des Österr. Archäol. Instituts, VIII 824.
- ROBERT, K. Bild und Lied [vol. V of Philologische Untersuchungen: Kiessling u. Wilamowitz]. Berlin, 1881.
- Niobe auf einem pompejanischen Marmorbild. Hermes, XXXVI 368-387. [Revised and separately published: Hallisches Winckelmanns programm, 1903.]
- Der pergamenische Fries. Jahrb. d. Deutsch. Archäol. Instituts, II 246 ff.; ibid. III 61 ff.
- Aphoristische Bemerkungen zu Sophokles' Ἰχνευρά. Hermes, XLVII 536-561.

- ROBERT, K. Pandora. Hermes, XLIX 17-38.
- ROSSBACH, O. Bemerkungen zu griechischen Papyri. Berl. philol. Woch., 1912, 1460 f.
- *ROSTAGNI, A. L'Euripilo di Sophocle ed un frammento epico adespoto. Bollettino di filologia class., XIX 156 ff.
- RUEHL, F. Vermischte Bemerkungen. Neue Jahrb. für Philol., CXVII 315.
- SCHENKL, H. Zu den 'Iḡvevrai des Sophokles. Hermes, XLVIII 153-156.
- SCHMIDT, F. W. Kritische Studien zu den griech. Dramatikern. [See especially 1 pp. 247-282.] Berlin, 1886.
- SCHMIDT, M. Variae Lectiones. Philologus, VII 749.
- — — Vermischtes. Philologus, VIII 112.
- [From an elaborate review of Nauck's first edition.] Zeitschrift für Alterthumswissenschaft, XIV 534-547.
- Zu den gr. Dramatikern. Philologus, XII 748 ff.
- Kritische Bemerkungen. Philologus, XVIII 229 f.
- Verbesserungsvorschläge zu schwierigen Stellen griech. Schriftsteller. Rhein. Mus. XXVI 207-218.
- SCHNEIDEWIN, F. W. Conjectanea Critica. Göttingen, 1839. [Spicilegium fragmentorum Sophocleorum, at p. 98 ff.]
- Lanx Saturata. Rhein. Mus., II 296 f.
- Sophokles Tereus [fr. 583]. Philologus, II 755.
- Ueber Soph. Aletes fr. 241 [fr. 646]. Philologus, III 89.
- Ueber Soph. Tyro. Philologus, III 168.
- SCHNEIDEWIN, O. [On Soph. fr. 567.] Zeitschrift für d. Alterthumswissenschaft, VII 1275 f.
- SCHROEDER, P. Zu Sophokles Phaidra. Neue Jahrb. f. Philol., CXXI 408.
- SEYFFERT, M. Zu den Fragmenten d. gr. Tragiker von A. Nauck. Rhein. Mus. XV 614 ff.
- STAHL, J. M. Zu den 'Iḡvevrai des Sophokles. Rhein. Mus. LXVIII 307 ff.
- THRAEMER, Ed. Pergamos. Leipzig, 1888.
- TUCKER, T. G. Adversaria upon the Fragments of Sophocles. Class. Rev., XVII 189-191.
- Further Adversaria upon the Fragments of Sophocles. Class. Rev., XVIII 245 f.
- *VALGIMIGLI, M. [On the 'Iḡvevrai of Sophocles.] Athenaeum (Pavia), vol. I, part 4 (1913).
- VATER, Fr. Die Aeladen des Sophokles. Berlin, 1835.
- Miscellaneorum criticorum fasciculus tertius. Neue Jahrb. f. Philol., Suppl. Bd XVII pp. 165-209.
- VILJOEN, H. G. Sophocles' Electra 1074 sqq. [Contains several notes on Ichneutae.] Classical Quarterly, X 1-6.
- VITELLI, G. [On fr. 679.] Mélanges Graux, p. 99.
- [On fr. 85.] Studi Ital. di filolog. class., 1894, p. 298.
- VOLLGRAFF, W. Ad Sophoclis Indagatores. Mnemosyne, XLII 81-90, 165-177.
- VÜRTHEIM, J. De Eugammonis Telegonia. Mnemosyne, XXIX 23-58.

- WAGENER, A. Un vers de Sophocle. Revue de l'Instruction publique en Belgique, XXXII 171 f.
- WAGNER, F. W. Zu Sophokles. Rhein. Mus. VII 149 f.
- Kritische Aehrenlese. Zeitschrift für d. Alterthumswissenschaft, X 15 f., 412-414.
- Niobe von Sophocles. Ibid. IV (1837), nr 12.
- WAGNER, R. Epitoma vaticana ex Apollodori Bibliotheca. Accedunt curae mythographae de Ap. fontibus, etc. Lipsiae, 1891.
- WECKLEIN, N. Ars Sophoclis emendandi. Wirceburgi, 1869.
- [Review of Papageorgius, op. cit.] Philol. Anzeiger, XI 18 ff.
- Zu gr. Schriftstellern. Rhein. Mus. XXXVI 141.
- Zu den Fragmenten des Sophokles. Rhein. Mus. XXXVIII 136 f.
- Ueber die Textüberlieferung d. Aeschylus u. anderer gr. Tragiker. Sitzungsber. d. Kgl. bayr. Akad. d. Wissensch., 1888, II 327-374 [pp. 356-358].
- Dramatisches u. kritisches zu den Fragmenten d. gr. Tragiker. Sitzungsber. 1890, I 1-57.
- Zu Sophokles. Neue Jahrb. f. Philol., CXLV 238.
- Ueber die dramatische Behandlung des Telephosmythus u. über die Dramen Ὀιστολόγοι, Κάβιροι, Σύνδαιπνοι. München, 1909.
- Zu den Ἰχνευταί des Sophokles. Bl. f. bayer. Gymn. 1913, 437.
- WEIL, H. Sur quelques fragments de Sophocle. Revue des études grecques, III 339-348.
- WILAMOWITZ-MOELLENDORFF, U. VON. De tragicorum Graecorum fragmentis. Göttingae, 1893.
- Die Spürkunde des Sophokles. Neue Jahrb. f. d. Klass. Altertum, XXIX 449-476.
- Einleitung in die gr. Tragödie. Berlin, 1907. [Reprint from first edition of Euripides, Herakles (1889).]
- WOLFF, G. Kritische Bemerkungen. Philologus, XVI 527.
- Zu Sophokles. Philologus, XXVIII 543 f.
- WORDSWORTH, Chr. Conjectural emendations. London, 1883.

ΣΟΦΟΚΛΕΟΥΣ

ΑΘΑΜΑΣ A AND B

There are two famous stories connected with the name of Athamas, which are recorded by our authorities with great variety of detail. One of these, the escape of Phrixus and Helle, was the starting-point of the Argonautic saga; and, though the evidence of the tragedians is the earliest to which we can now appeal, it must have been related in the lost epics. Athamas, king of Thebes, by his union with Nephele, an immortal, had two children, Phrixus and Helle. He subsequently married Ino, who bore to him Learchus and Melicertes. Ino was jealous of the children of Nephele, and, when a drought occurred—produced, according to one version, by the cunning of Ino herself—she bribed the messengers who were sent by Athamas to consult the oracle at Delphi, and persuaded them to give a false report. They accordingly announced that the god required the sacrifice of Phrixus as an expiation. Athamas was obliged against his will to consent, but Nephele succeeded in saving her children by means of a ram with a golden fleece, which Hermes gave to her. This ram, placed among the flocks of Athamas, was not only endowed with the power of speech, so that it was able to warn Phrixus of his impending danger, but also rescued him and his sister by taking them on its back, and flying away with them across the sea. Helle, unable to keep her seat, fell into the sea, and gave her name to the Hellespont; but Phrixus escaped to Colchis, where he sacrificed the ram and presented its fleece to Aeetes. Such is the general tenor of the more or less discrepant versions of Apollod. i. 80—83, Philosteph. fr. 37 (FHG III 31), schol. rec. Aesch. Pers. 71, Zenob. 4. 38 and others; and there is some reason for supposing that Euripides made these events the basis of his Phrixus (TGF, p. 626), possibly with some of the variations recorded by Hygin. fab. 2.

Sophocles wrote two plays entitled Athamas, and, although the fragments preserved are almost entirely insignificant, we have direct evidence that one of them was concerned with a version of the story given above. But the central incident in Sophocles was not the rescue of Phrixus, but the subsequent fate of Athamas. This appears from schol. V Ar. Nub. 257 (ὥσπερ με τὸν Ἀθάμανθ' ὅπως μὴ θύσετε) τοῦτο πρὸς τὸν ἕτερον Ἀθάμαντα Σοφοκλέους ἀποτεινόμενος λέγει. ὁ γὰρ τοι Σοφοκλῆς πεποίηκε τὸν Ἀθίμαντα ἐστεφανωμένον καὶ παρεστῶτα τῷ βωμῷ τοῦ Διὸς ὡς σφαγιασθησόμενον, καὶ μέλλοντος (-τα cod.) ἀποσφάττεσθαι αὐτοῦ παραγνόμενον Ἡρακλέα, καὶ [τὸν] τοῦτον θανάτου ῥυόμενον. The recent scholia, partly reproduced in Apostol. II. 58 (Paroem. II 529 f.) under the lemma μὴ θεῶς ἄνθρωπον ὡς Ἀθάμας, add (1) that the punishment of Athamas was brought about by Nephele on account of his conduct to her children; (2) that Heracles saved Athamas by announcing that Phrixus was alive. The latter point is also mentioned in Suid. s.v. Ἀθάμας, who omits the reference to Sophocles. The rejoinder of schol. R, to which some critics have attached too much importance, is merely an ignorant objection: ὡς ἄγροικος Ἀθάμαντα εἶπεν ἀντὶ Φρίξου· ἀντὶ τοῦ εἰπεῖν τὸν Φρίξον τὸν Ἀθάμαντα εἶπεν ὡς ἄγροικος ἀγνοῶν τὰς ἱστορίας· οὐ γὰρ Ἀθάμας ἐφο<νέυθη>, ἀλλὰ Φρίξος. For the tradition that Athamas was sacrificed does not depend upon this evidence alone, but is recorded as a local legend, which was current at Alos in Thessaly, by Hdt. 7. 197. His narrative is not at all clear, but so much at least is germane to the present discussion, that Athamas was sacrificed καθαρμὸν τῆς χώρας ποιουμένων Ἀχαιῶν ἐκ θεοπροπίου, and that Cytissorus the son of Phrixus arrived from Colchis and rescued him. Several questions will at once suggest themselves in reference to the dramatic treatment which Sophocles may have applied to this material, but to most of them no answer is possible. It is, however, a legitimate observation that the means by which Nephele compassed the sacrifice of Athamas, together with the arrival of Heracles, the delivery of his message, and the release of Athamas, were amply sufficient to occupy the whole of the action. I infer that the history of the plot against Phrixus, with all its ἄλογα, although ἐν τοῖς πράγμασιν, to use Aristotle's language (poet. 15. 1454^b 7), was nevertheless ἔξω τῆς τραγωδίας. It seems to follow that Athamas must have supposed Phrixus to be dead, although he was not slain at the altar; and, since Helle actually perished, that she cannot have been included in the design aimed at her brother. The religious questions connected with the sacrifice of Athamas, which are discussed by Frazer (Pausan. v p. 172) and others, do not concern us here. The date of this play must have been earlier than B.C. 423.

In the other story mentioned above Athamas was the apparently innocent victim of the wrath of Hera. She afflicted him with madness, because Hermes by the command of Zeus had given Dionysus to Ino and Athamas to be reared as a girl: see Hygin. fab. 5, Apollod. 1. 84, 3. 28, Pausan. 1. 44. 7. The result was that Athamas, believing that he was hunting on Cithaeron, mistook his elder son Learchus for a lion (or a stag) and killed him with his spear; and that Ino, distraught with frenzy and grief, took the other child Melicertes in her arms and threw herself into the sea. Hence the proverb Ἰνούς ἄχη in Zenob. 4. 38 and Horace's flebilis Ino (A.P. 123). The story can be traced to Pherecydes (Schol. Hom. Σ 486: FHG I 84); and Seeliger (in Roscher I 670), and more doubtfully Escher (in Pauly-Wissowa II 1931), identify it as the subject of the second play of Sophocles¹. Apart from the general probabilities of the case, it is possible that frs. 2 and 9 refer to the delusion of Athamas. Ov. Met. 4. 420 ff. elaborates this version of the story in his usual manner, but the following touches (512 ff.) appear to be taken from his Greek models: protinus Aeolides media furibundus in aula | clamat 'io, comites, his retia tendite silvis! | hic modo cum gemina visa est mihi prole leaena.' See fr. 2 and Tr. fr. adesp. 1 βραζούσης λεαίνης, which may just as well belong to Sophocles as to Aeschylus. Cf. Plut. de superst. 5. p. 167 c ó δ' Ἀθάμας μεῖζονι (sc. ἐχρήτο δυστυχία) καὶ ἡ Ἀγαίη βλέποντες (sc. τὰ τέκνα vel τοὺς συνήθεις) ὡς λέοντας καὶ ἐλάφους. There is nothing to show whether Athamas used his bow (Stat. Theb. 1. 12), or whether the scene was inside the house, as in Ovid, or on the mountain side (Stat. Theb. 3. 186), unless indeed ἐπιπλα fr. 8 has any significance. Further, as Welcker has observed, fr. 4 suits the final plight of Athamas restored to his senses and realising the extent of his losses. This would precede his withdrawal to another country, for which cf. Apollod. 1. 84. But none of these indications are so strong as that of fr. 5, where we can hardly fail to see an allusion to the miraculous power of Dionysus. Unless then the reference to the influence of the god is to be explained by his nurture in the palace of Athamas (cf. Lucian dial. mar. 9. 1), it would seem that in this play, as in the Ino of Euripides (Hygin. fab. 4), the wife of Athamas had joined the Maenads to share their mystic worship on the hills. It is generally believed that in that play Euripides introduced the story of Themisto, the third wife of Athamas, who plotted against the children of Ino as cruelly and as unsuccessfully as Ino had plotted against those of Nephele. There is nothing to connect Sophocles with this story, although the name of Themisto was freely used by later writers as the cause of the ruin of Athamas' household: see Athen. 560 D, Westermann Mythogr. p. 345. The evidence which connects the play with the Dionysus-motive is clear enough, and allusions to the madness of Athamas and to the final catastrophe may fairly be inferred; but beyond this we cannot go. There is nothing to show that the fragments of Accius' Athamas can be legitimately used to elucidate the plot of Sophocles¹.

¹ Ahrens suggests that Cic. harusp. resp. 39 illa exsultatio Athamantis, which follows a reference to tragedies, may be an allusion to the play of Sophocles.

It should be observed that the progress of the Athamas-legend shows the gradual combination of at least three stories, which were originally entirely distinct, and belonged to different localities. The subject cannot be pursued here; but an illustration may be given from the fragment of Philostephanus (Schol. AD Hom. H 86, cf. Pausan. I. 44. 7), the pupil of Callimachus, who omits the Bacchic influence entirely, and attributes the death of Learchus to the retribution exacted by Athamas for Ino's treachery.

See also Introductory Note to the Phrixus.

Dindorf held that 'Αθάμας α' and β' were not separate plays, but different editions of the same play. He applies the same principle to other similar cases, but in the absence of specific evidence of revision the presumption is strongly against him.

I

καταγινώναι

1 Hesych. II p. 421 καταγινώναι· ἐπιγινώναι, μέμψασθαι. Σοφοκλῆς 'Αθάμαντι α'.

A few lines before Hesych. has the gloss καταγινώσκω· μέμφομαι. ἐπιγινώναι is added as an explanation, because the sense 'to find out' was common in later Greek: see e.g. Plut. Philop. 12 ἐπιγινώσκου τῆς ἐπιβουλῆς. Thus καταγινώσκω is, as observed by Neil on Ar. Eq. 46 οὗτος καταγινούς τοῦ γέροντος τοῦ τρόπου, 'to find out to another's detriment,' with various constructions. A good example is Thuc. 7. 51 κατεγινώκτων ἤδη μηκέτι κρείσσονων εἶναι, where the inf. takes the place of the acc. of the thing. It should be observed that καταγινώσκω occasionally appears without the innuendo, being precisely equivalent to ἐπιγινώσκω: Xen. Oec. 2. 18 καὶ θάπτον καὶ ῥῶον καὶ κερδαλιώτερον κατέγνων πράττοντας.

2

ἔρκεσι

2 Hesych. II p. 192 ἔρκεσι· δίκτυοις. Σοφοκλῆς 'Αθάμαντι β'. The same gloss occurs in Phot. lex. p. 14, 12 without the name of author or play.

Cf. Etym. M. p. 375, 10 ἔρκος...σημαίνει καὶ τὰ δίκτυα ὡς τὸ ὅτε δὴ παρὰ λίνου ἔρκει ἐνιπλήξωσι (a confused quotation of Hom. χ 468). The same sense occurs in fr. 431, Ar. Av. 528 ἔρκη, νεφέλας, δίκτυα, πηκτάς, Pind. Pyth. 2. 80 φελλὸς ὡς ὑπὲρ ἔρκος. For a possible explanation of the allusion see Introductory Note.

¹ The conjectures that have been made as to Accius' sources are mutually destructive. It is now thought (Escher in Pauly-Wissowa II 1933) that his play comprised the material of Hygin. poet. astr. 2. 20, which Sophocles may have used in the Phrixus.

3

ἐψία

3 Hesych. II p. 249 ἐψία· γέλωσ, παιδιά, χλεύη. ἐφοδος· ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐπεσθαι. ὁμιλία. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀθάμαντι δευτέρῳ.

Outside the lexicographers, the word seems only to occur in Nic. Ther. 880 σπέρμ' ὁλοὺν κνίδης, ἥθ' ἐψία ἐπλετο κούροις, where the schol. explains it by παίγνιον. The verb ἐψιάσθαι, with its compounds ἐφ. καθ- and ἀφεψιάσθαι (fr. 138), is somewhat more common. There are also to be taken into account the gloss ἀψία· ἐορταί. Λάκωνες (Hesych. I p. 347) and the compounds φιλέψιος (a proper name in Ar. Plut. 177, where see schol.), προσ-εψία (Hesych.). The history of this obscure and obsolete word was much canvassed by the grammarians, although there is a general agreement as to its meaning ('amusement'). The authority whom Hesychius follows derived it from ἐπεσθαι tracing the transition (ἐφοδος) of the meaning to παιδιά by way of ὁμιλία: for the transferred sense of ἐφοδος (= transit of passing), not clearly recognised by L. and S., see Plut. mor. 1055 F, Diog. L. 6.

31. There was, however, some wavering as to the breathing; and on this account an alternative derivation from ἔπος was propounded: schol. Ar. Rhod. I. 459 ἐψιόωνται. παρὰ τὴν ἐψίαν, ἥ ἐστι διὰ λόγων παιδιά· ὅλον ἐπεσία τις οὖσα· παρὰ τὸ ἔπος. διὸ καὶ ψιλοῦνται, ὅτε δὲ δασύνεται, ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀκολουθοῦσιν. So φιλέψιος was distinguished as meaning φιλοπαίγμων or φιλόλογος, according as the second syllable was or was not aspirated (Etym. M. p. 406, 8, Suid. s.v. ἐψία). Some modern scholars have favoured the view that ἐ- is prothetic, and that the word is to be connected with ψιάδδωναι = ludunt, in Ar. Lys. 1302: this was adopted by Curtius (G. E. II p. 394 E. tr.), who however forbore to speculate on the derivation. Lobeck's (Path. El. I 52) notion that ἐψία was 'a game played with pebbles' rests on the assumption that ψία was another form of στία. Monro on Hom. p. 530 takes an entirely different line, holding that ἐψιόμαι 'implies a noun ἔψις, from a root ἐπ-, Indog. ieq, seen in Lat. iocus.'

4

ὥς ὦν ἅπαις τε καὶ γύναιξ κανέστιος

4 Choerob. in Theod. p. 307, 15 [=p. 289, 25 Hilgard] (Bekk. anecd. p. 1304) τὸ γυναιξ οὐκ ἠδύνατο ἀρσενικοῦ γένους εἶναι... ἐν δὲ τῇ συνθέσει ἐπειδὴ γίνεται ἀρσενικοῦ γένους, ἀναδέχεται τὴν εἰς αἰξ κατάληξιν, ὡς ὦν ἅπαις... ἀνέστιος' παρὰ Σοφοκλεί ἐν Ἀθάμαντι.—ἀγύναιξ. Cf. Poll. 3. 48 Ἀριστοφάνης (fr. 735 1 569 K.) δὲ τὸν ἀγύνην ἀγύνων, Φρόνιχος (fr. 19 1 376 K.) δὲ 'τῆλικοιτοσί γέρον ἀπαις ἀγύναικος.' The forms καλλιγύναικα, ὁρσιγύναικα, φιλογύναικες, ἡμιγύναικα and the like have no nominative in existence, as was pointed out by Lobeck on Phryn. pp. 185, 659.—ἀνέστιος was no doubt borrowed from Hom. I 63 ἀφρήτωρ, ἀθέμιστος, ἀνέστιός ἐστιν ἐκεῖνος, | δὲ πολέμου ἔραται ἐπίδημιόν ὀκρυβεντος. Our homeless gives the general idea; for πατρώα ἐστία was the sacred centre-point of family life (Eur. Alc. 737).

5

οἶνω παρ' ἡμῶν ἀχελῶως ἄρα νᾶ.

5 παρ' H.: γάρ cod. | ἀχελῶοι ἄρα cod.

5 Lex. Messan. f. 280 sq. (Rh. Mus. xlvii 405 ff.) νᾶ σὺν τῷ ἰ μᾶ συναβῆ Σοφοκλῆς Ἀθάμαντι (ἀθάνατ. cod.: corr. Rabe) 'οἶνω γὰρ ἡμῶν ἀχελῶοι ἄρα νᾶ.' H. wrote: 'As the passage is expressly quoted for the use of νᾶ, I do not know why Nauck should have shrunk from writing ἄρα. But in that case γὰρ ἡμῶν must be wrong, and should probably be replaced by παρ' ἡμῶν (ὑμῶν).' The inferential use of ἀρα (for ἄρα) is clearly seen in O. C. 409, 858, and may be taken to be established: see on fr. 931, Eur. Helid. 895. Mekler (Eranois Vindob. p. 208) conjectured ἀδρά νᾶ.—The verse refers to the miraculous draughts of wine provided by Dionysus for his votaries: Eur. Bacch. 143 ῥεὶ δὲ γάλακτι πέδον, ῥεὶ δ' ὀινῷ. id. 707 καὶ τῇδε κρήνην ἐξαῆκ' οἶνου θεῶς. Such an allusion accords well enough with the story of Ino: Hygin. fab. 4 postea rescit Inonem in Parnasso esse, quae (quam Muncker) bacchationis causa eo pervenisse. Nonn. 9. 247 ff. Cf. also Eur. Bacch. 229, Med. 1284. Thus, ἄχελ-ῶς is used for water, as in Eur. Bacch. 625 δμῶσιν ἄχελῶν φέρειν | ἐνέπων, and elsewhere.—νᾶ: for derivatives from this root cf. fr. 270 νᾶτορ, fr. 621 ναρά.

6

λευκὴν ἡμέραν

6 Antiatl. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 106, 33 λευκὴν ἡμέραν τὴν ἀγαθὴν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀθάμαντι. Cf. Phot. lex. p. 217, 5 λευκὴ ἡμέρα ἢ ἀγαθὴ. καὶ ἐπ' εὐφροσύνην. Εὐπολις Κόλαξι (fr. 174 I 306 K.). The same occurs in Suid. s.v., and in some MSS Σοφοκλῆς is substituted for Εὐπολις Κόλαξι; but Αἰ. 672 f. follow immediately. Zenob. 6. 13 (Paroem. I 165) καὶ Μέ-ναδρος δὲ φησιν ἐν Λευκαδίῳ (fr. 315 III 90 K.) τὴν ἀγαθὴν ἡμέραν λευκὴν καλεῖσθαι. Herodian. Philol. (in Moeris ed. Pierson, p. 477) λευκὴν ἡμέραν διαγαγεῖν, τὴν ἡδεῖαν καὶ ἰσάραν.

ἡλευκὴ ἡμέρα, lucida (Eur. I. A. 156 λευκαῖα τῶδε φῶς ἦν ἡ λάμπουσα Ἡώς), λευκόντωλος, λευκόντεπλος, meant properly the silvery grey of dawn in contrast to the night (Aesch. Ag. 673 ἔπειτα δ' αἰδὼν πόν-τιον πεφευγότες, | λευκὸν κατ' ἡμᾶρ κτέ.), and so might be said metaphorically of relief, cheer, comfort, as in Pers. 304 ἐμοῖς μὲν εἶπας δῶμασιν φάος μέγα, | καὶ λευκὸν ἡμᾶρ νυκτὸς ἐκ μελαγχίμου: this is how Sophocles may have used it. (H.) So λευκὸν εὐάμερον φάος in Αἰ. 708. λευκὴ ἡμέρα is used proverbially much as we say 'a red-letter day' in Eunap. fr. 28 Boiss., Aristaen. I. 12. The purpose of the grammarians was to mark the metaphorical usage, which is found also in Latin: Catull. 8. 3 fulsere quondam candidi tibi soles, as contrasted with Hor. Sat. I. 9. 72 huncine solem tam nigrum surrexe nihili! There is no need to seek for any artificial explanation, such as that which Suidas (s.v. λευκὴ ἡμέρα, τῶν εἰς φαρέτραν) quotes from Philarchus (FHG I 355), based on an alleged custom of the Scythians to put a white stone into their quiver at night-time for a day spent happily, or a black in the other event. Plin. n. h. 7. 40 tells a similar story of the Thracians, and some such practice is alluded to in Hor. C. I. 36. 10, Pers. 2. 1, Catull. 68. 148. Plin. ep. 6. 11. Plutarch gives another explanation, relating that Pericles during the blockade of Samos allowed such of his soldiers as drew by lot a white bean to be relieved from discipline and enjoy themselves as they pleased: διὸ καὶ φασὶ τοὺς ἐν εὐπαθείαις τοῖς γιγνομένοις λευκὴν ἡμέραν ἐκείνην ἀπὸ τοῦ λευκοῦ κνᾶμου προσαγορεύειν (Per. 27). Is it merely a coincidence that Eupolis in the Kólares referred to this siege (fr. 154 I 299 K.)? Horace speaks of Genius as albus et ater (Ep. 2. 2. 189), i.e. εὐδαίμων or the reverse.

7

ἀγχήρης

7 Hesych. I p. 36 ἀγχήρης (ἀγχηρή-ρης cod.) ὁ ἐγγύς. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀθάμαντι. The correct reading is preserved in Elym. M. p. 15, 33 ἀγχήρης ἐγγύς.

The termination, usually connected with ἀραρίσκω, is the same as that found in τριήρης, ποδῆρης, κατήρης, πλειστήρης, μεστήρης, τυμβήρης, κισστήρης, τειχήρης, πυργήρης, ἀμφήρης and others. The history of some of these words is not free from doubt, but the force of -ήρης as an element of composition seems to have been reduced, so that in the time of the tragedians it had become productive as a merely adjectival suffix. See also Wilamowitz on Eur. Her. 243.

8

ἐπιπλα

8 Harpocr. s.v. ἐπιπλον p. 82, 10 τὰ κατὰ τὴν οἰκίαν σκεύη ἐπιπλα λέγουσι, τὴν οἶον ἐπιπόλαιον κτήσιν καὶ μετακομίζεσθαι δυναμένῃ. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀθάμαντι (so Casaubon for ἀκάμαντι). Hesych. II p. 164 goes more into detail: ἐπιπλα ἱμάτια γυναικεῖα, ἢ χρώματα, ἢ σκεύη, τὰ μὴ ἐγγεῖα, ἀλλ' ἐπιπόλαια. Suidas, who has three separate glosses on the word, is much to the same effect, but gives alternative derivations from ἐπίπλασι or δυνατὴ πλοῖζεσθαι ('to be put on board'). The word means moveables; but it is an elastic term, and is sometimes restricted to what we call furniture (dresses or jewels, as in Dem. 27. 10. Etymologically it may be connected with δι-πλό-ς, sim-plex and our three-fold: see Brugmann, Comp. Gr. III p. 50 E. tr. The fullest discussion of the word is in Pollux 10. 10 f.

9

ἐπισίγματα

9 Hesych. II p. 170 ἐπιστήγματα ἐπικελεύματα. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀθάμαντι. Salmassius emended to ἐπιστήματα, and so Hesychius must have written, as the alphabetical order shows; but that ἐπιστήματα was the form used by Sophocles is proved not merely by Moeris p. 196, 34 ἐπισίξας Ἀττικοί· ἐπισίξας Ἕλληνες, but also by the evidence of early texts. Cf. Ar. Vesp. 704 κἄθ' ὅταν οὗτος γ' ἐπισίξῃ, with the schol. Αἰκώφρων καὶ οἱ περὶ Ἐρατοσθένη τὸ ἐπαφίεναι τὰς κύνας ἐπισίξεν. Theocr. 6. 29 σίξα δ' ὕλακτεῖν νυν καὶ τῇ κυνί. Suid. ἐπισίξει· ποῖόν τινα ἦχον ἐπιβοήσει. Etym. M. p. 363, 54 ἐπίσιστον· τὸ συρίζοντας ἐποτρύνειν τοὺς κύνας ἐπὶ τὰ ἔργα ἐν τοῖς κυνηγεσίοις ἐπίσιστον καλεῖται. In Phil. 155 Bergk conjectured τοῦπίσιγμα for τοῦπίσιγμα. It is suggested that this refers to the death of Learchus, hunted as a stag by his father Athamas: Apollod. 3. 28 Ἀθάμας μὲν τὸν πρεσβύτερον παῖδα Λεάρχον ὡς ἑλαφον θηρεύσας ἀπέκτεινεν. See Introductory Note. It should be added that Hesych. II p. 167 has also ἐπίσιγμα· ἐπεγκέλευμα κυνῶν, and ἐπισίξας· ἐπαφείς ἐπὶ ὁρμήν. ἢ ἐπισίξας.

10

ἐχρωματίσθη

10 Hesych. II p. 248 ἐχρωματίσθη· συνεχρώσθη. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀθάμαντι. Cf. Suid. s.v. ἐχρωματίσθη· χρώμα ἐδέξατο.

Tr. fr. adesp. 275 χρωματισθεὶς εὐθὺς ἐξ εὐνῆς φόνωφ.

ΑΙΑΣ ΛΟΚΡΟΣ

Ajax, Ἰλίου τοῦ ταχὺς υἱός, is introduced in Hom. B 527 as leader of the Locrians who dwelt opposite to the coast of Euboea. He is often mentioned in the Iliad in conjunction with the Telamonian Ajax; and, though inferior in strength as compared with his namesake, is nevertheless a distinguished warrior who comes especially into prominence at the battle round the wall (N 46). The circumstances of his death are related in δ 499 ff. He was one of the victims of the storm which overtook the Greeks on their return from Troy, and, when landing on the rocks at Myconus known as the Gyrae, was hurled back into the sea by Poseidon and drowned, in punishment for a boastful speech that he needed no divine aid to escape. Homer says that he was ἐχθόμενος Ἀθήνῃ, without explaining the reason; but, if we accept the explanation of Strabo (600), this merely implies that he was involved in the common fate which befel the Greeks for abusing their victory in the sack of Troy. Homer, he says, has not mentioned any outrage committed against Cassandra, and knows nothing of her violation by Ajax. Yet, even in Homer, the character of Ajax showed traces of a cruel and savage disposition, and his arrogant contempt for the gods led to his destruction. It is clear, however, that an act of sacrilegious violence committed by him was described in the *Iliupersis*¹: see Proclus chrestom. (EGF p. 49) Κασσάνδραν δὲ Αἴας Ὀϊλέως πρὸς βίαν ἀποσπῶν συνεφέλκεται τὸ τῆς Ἀθηνᾶς ξόανον· ἐφ' ᾧ παροξυνθέντες οἱ Ἕλληνες καταλεύσιν βούλονται τὸν Αἴαντα, ὃ δὲ ἐπὶ τὸν τῆς Ἀθηνᾶς βωμὸν καταφεύγει, καὶ διασώζεται ἐκ τοῦ ἐπικειμένου κινδύνου. To the latter part of this corresponds Apollod. epit. 5. 25 ὡς δὲ ἔμελλον ἀποπλεῖν πορθήσαντες Τροίαν, ὑπὸ Κάλχαντος κατείχοντο, μνηστὴρ Ἀθηνᾶν αὐτοῖς λέγοντος διὰ τὴν Αἴαντος ἀσέβειαν. καὶ τὸν μὲν Αἴαντα κτείνειν ἔμελλον, φεύγοντα δὲ ἐπὶ βωμὸν εἴσαν. Cf. schol. Hom. γ 135. Welcker (p. 162) rightly observed that the Homeric story does not seem capable of dramatic treatment; but in the extracts just quoted the possibility of a tragic conflict is manifest. It can hardly be doubted that we have here part of the framework of the Sophoclean plot, more especially as the account of Apollodorus explains Eur. Tro. 69—71: ΑΘ. οὐκ οἶσθ' ὑβρισθεῖσάν με καὶ ναοὺς ἐμούς; | ΠΟ. οἶδ' ἥνικ' Αἴας εἶλκε Κασάνδραν βίᾳ. | ΑΘ. κοῦδέν γ' Ἀχαιῶν ἔπαθεν οὐδ' ἤκουσ' ὕπο. Further details are given by Pausanias in his description of the painting by Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi (10. 26. 3): 'Ajax the son of Oileus stands by the altar with his shield, taking an oath concerning the outrage on Cassandra; while Cassandra is seated on the ground clasping the image of Athena, as it seems that she overturned it from its pedestal, when Ajax dragged her from the sanctuary.' Robert (Die Iliupersis, p. 63) thinks that Ajax was swearing to atone for his crime by sending two Locrian maidens annually to the temple of Athena at Troy. He thus connects the oath with the temple-story (Toepffer in Pauly-Wissowa I 938) which sought to explain the historical custom by reference to a heroic legend. The chief authorities for the Locrian tribute, which lasted until shortly before the time of Plutarch, are Timaeus ap. Tzetz. Lycophr. 1141 (FHG I 207), and Callimachus ap. schol. AD Hom. N 66 (II 126 Schneider). See also Holzinger on Lycophr. 1153. But Robert's explanation of the oath taken by Ajax is somewhat far-fetched, and it is simpler to suppose that there is a reference to the exculpatory oath which is prescribed as a mode of trial by primitive systems of jurisprudence: see Wyse on Isae. 12. 9. In any case, the trial of Ajax before the council of elders provided an occasion for a formal debate (λόγων ἀγών) such as the tragedians loved. It is sometimes stated (as by Toepffer u.s.) that the erotic motive and the violation of the priestess did not belong to the original story, but were the invention of later writers (e.g. Dio Chrys. 11. 153). The conclusion is questionable; and it is worth notice that Apollod. epit. 5. 22 Αἴας δὲ ὁ Λοκρὸς Κασάνδραν ὄρων περιπεπλεγμένην τῷ ξοῦνῳ τῆς Ἀθηναίης βιώνεται· διὰ τοῦτο τὸ ξόανον εἰς οὐρανὸν βλέπειν, which is believed to derive from epic sources, agrees exactly in its account of the miraculous aversion of the gaze of the image with Lycophr. 361 f. (cf. Strabo 264). The early appearance of the motive is also attested by Theogn. 1223 f. ὦλετο δ' Αἰγείδης Θησεὺς μέγας ὦλετο δ' Αἴας | ἐσθλὸς Ὀϊλιάδης σῆσιν (sc. Ἐρωτος) ἀτασθαλίαις, as well as by the evidence of early vase-paintings collected by Furtwängler and Reichhold, Griech. Vasenmal. München 1904, I p. 185, and summarized by Gruppe in Bursians Jahresb. CXXXVII 387.

¹ On the question relating to the overlapping of the Little Iliad and the Iliupersis and as to whether there were or were not two poems with the latter title, composed by Arctinus and Lesches respectively, see Frazer, Pausanias, v p. 362; T. W. Allen in Cl. Q. 11 84.

The effect of the above discussion is to determine the outlines of the story as known to Sophocles: we are still as far as ever from being able to fill in the details, or to trace the process by which the tragic περιπέτεια resulted. No doubt the outrage in the temple was outside the action of the play, and the two chief moments that fell within the time covered by it were the acquittal of Ajax by the Achaeans, and his subsequent death at Gyrae. It was impossible for the latter to be enacted on the stage, and it must either have been related by a messenger or foretold by a god. The former alternative is clearly to be preferred, but involves the assumption that Ajax sailed before the rest of the Greeks, and that his death was reported at Ilion before the other characters in the play had started. It is more difficult to conjecture how the acquittal of Ajax was procured. A possible suggestion, based on the lawless character of the accused and the oath mentioned by Pausanias, would be that he escaped death by a brazen act of perjury, but was required as being ceremonially unclean to withdraw from the rest of the army. The retribution of the offended deities was not long in coming; but even so the shadow of impending disaster hung over those who had connived at the crime of Ajax. It may be inferred from Pausan. 10. 31. 2 that the chief opponent of Ajax was Odysseus.

The version of the story adopted by Philostr. heroic. 9 presents certain features which suggest a dramatic origin, although we have no means of identifying it.

According to this, Ajax dragged Cassandra from the temple, but offered no violence to her, and kept her in his tent. Agamemnon saw the girl, fell in love with her, and took her from Ajax. When the spoils were divided, Ajax claimed her, but Agamemnon refused to give her up and accused Ajax of sacrilege. In order to excite odium against Ajax, he also caused a rumour to be spread through the camp that Athena was incensed in consequence of the outrage, and would destroy the army unless Ajax were put to death. But Ajax, fearing injustice and oppression, if he submitted himself to trial, secretly withdrew by night in a small boat and was drowned off Gyrae.

From Lucian de salt. 46 καθ' ἑκαστον γούν τῶν ἐκεῖ (i.e. at Troy) πεσόντων δράμα τῇ σκηνῇ πρόκειται... ἢ κατὰ Παλαμήδους ἐπιβουλὴ καὶ ἢ Ναυπλίου ὀργὴ καὶ ἢ Αἴαντος μανία καὶ ἢ θατέρου ἐν ταῖς πέτραις ἀπώλεια, Nalick is justified in inferring an allusion to the present play. Hygin. fab. 116 cannot be used in support of Hartung's view that the story of Nauplius was combined with that of the Locrian Ajax in a single tragedy.

II

καταστίκτου κυνὸς
σπολὰς Λίβυσσα, παρδαληφόρον δέρος

11. 2 σπολα σαμβύσσα R

11 Schol. Ar. Av. 933 πρὸς τὴν σπολάδα, ὅτι διφθέρα ὁποιαοῦν. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰάντι Λοκρῷ 'καταστίκτου... δέρος.' Καλλίστρατος δὲ οἶον ἔφαπτον δερμάτων. Εὐφρόνιος δὲ χιτῶνα δερμάτων. παρήχθη δὲ ἴσως ἐκ τοῦ ἐπιφέρεισθαι, οὐκ ἔξδ' ἐνέξωσθαι διφθέραν. τὸ δὲ Σοφύκλειον ἐπὶ τοῦ δέρματος εἴρηται τοῦ κρεμαμένου πρὸς τῇ τοῦ 'Αντήνορος οἰκίᾳ. This note appears in an abridged form in Suid. s.v. σπολὰς, and v. 2 is quoted by Pollux 7. 70 without the name of the play.

2 σπολὰς may be conveniently rendered 'jerkin.' Pollux (l.c.) speaks of it as a leathern cuirass, fastened at the shoulders, and Photius (lex. p. 531, 17) as δερμάτων ἐφαπτῶδες, suitable for use in war. It is sometimes described as χιτῶν, as by Euphronius and Hesych.; but the distinction (παρήχθη), according to the schol.'s suggestion, lay in the mode of attachment, since a leather coat could not be strapped with a girdle.—παρδαληφόρον δέρος. L. and S. give παρδαληφόρον and are followed by Campbell, who renders 'the hide the leopard wore,' as if it could be assumed at will. So also Blaydes, who however suspects that we should read παρδαλῆς στικτὸν δέρος and eject καταστίκτου κυνὸς as a gloss. But this is contrary to all analogy, and there is no more difficulty in the transference of the epithet than e.g. in κεραισφόρους σπάρθυγγας fr. 89, ξιφηφόρους ἀγῶνας Aesch. Cho. 582 or κισσοφόρους ἐν θαλάσῃ Eur. Bacch. 384. Much confusion in the treatment of compounds would be avoided, if critics would pay more attention to the simple and logical methods of the Sanskrit grammarians: see Feile, Notes on Tale of Nala p. 3 ff., Brugmann Comp. Gr. II p. 92 E. tr.

The reference is to the leopard-skin hung outside the house of Antenor, in order that it might be identified and spared when the Greeks entered Troy: see Strab. 608, a passage to be quoted in connexion with the Antenoridae. Hartung thinks that our fragment actually came from the last-named play and is wrongly attributed to the Locrian Ajax, but the incident might well have been mentioned in a play which was so closely concerned with the circumstances of the sack of the city.—perhaps, as Wagner suggests, in the speech of Cassandra accusing Ajax.

12

τὸ χρύσειον δὲ τὰς Δίκας δέδορκεν
ὄμμα, τὸν δ' ἄδικον ἀμείβεται.

12. 1 τὰς δίκας Stob. et Ath. codd.

12 Stob. eccl. I. 3. 37 p. 59. 2 W. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰάντι. 'τὸ χρύσειον... ἀμείβεται.' The passage is also cited in exactly by Athen. 546 B καὶ ποῦ τις καὶ ποιητὴς ἐφθέγγετο (Eur. fr. 486) 'δικαιοσύνας τὸ χρύσειον πρόσωπον' καὶ πάλιν 'τὸ χρύσειον ὄμμα τὸ τὰς Δίκας,' where the writer appears wrongly to assert that the two quotations are from the same poet.

'The eye of Justice' became proverbial: see Polyb. 23. 10. 3 κατὰ τὴν παροιμίαν

ἔστι δίκης ὀφθαλμός, ἧς μηδέποτε δεῖ καταφρονεῖν ἀνθρώπους ὑπάρχοντας (Suid. s.v. δίκης ὀφθαλμός). Tr. fr. adesp. 421 ἔστιν Δίκης ὀφθαλμός, ὅς τὰ πάντ' ὄρε (sometimes attributed to Diphilus or Philemon). Dionys. fr. 5 ὁ τῆς Δίκης ὀφθαλμὸς ὡς δεῖ ἡσύχαι | λεύσσαι προσώπου πάντ' ὁμῶς αἰεὶ βλέπει. A. P. 7. 357 κἄν με κατακρύψει ὡς οὐδενὸς ἀνδρὸς ὁρώντος, | ὄμμα Δίκης καθορᾷ πάντα τὰ γινόμενα. Cercidas fr. 1 col. ii 12 μήποτ' οἶν ὁ τὰς Δίκας ὀφθαλμὸς ἀπὸ σπάλακται; In Eur. Syrph.

564 τὸ τῆς Δίκης σφύρον φάος is doubtful. Occasionally it is varied to the eye 'of Zeus' or 'of the gods': Tr. fr. adesp. 485 οὐχ εὐδὲ Διὸς | ὀφθαλμοῖς, ἐγγὺς δ' ἐστὶ καίπερ ὧν πρόσω, 491 ὁξὺς θεῶν ὀφθαλμοῖς εἰς τὰ πάντ' ἰδεῖν, 499 μέγα γὰρ ὄμμα δαιμόνων, οἷς τίνοισ' ἀμοιβὰς κακῶν. Zeus is all-seeing: O. C. 704, Ant. 184, El. 175, 659. Tr. fr. adesp. 43, 278. Cf. Eur. fr. 555 ἀλλ' ἡ δίκη γὰρ καὶ διὰ σκότου βλέπει. The addition of χρόσεον, still more boldly applied by Eur. fr. 486, suggests a comparison like that of Pind. Ol. 1. 1 to the searching rays of the sun (Ant. 103, Aesch. Ag. 300, Eur. fr. 771): cf. ὁ πάντα λείσσω ἥλιος O. C. 869.

Similarly Tr. fr. adesp. 500 Δίκας δ' ἐξέλαμψε θεῖον φάος.

The metre cannot be determined exactly, but it seems probable that two iambic trimeters are comprised in the words quoted. In that case the second line is defective, and I would suggest that we should read <ἐξ> αμείβεται, a word suspected without any cause in Aesch. Prom. 239 κακὰισι ποιναῖς ταῖσδε μ' ἐξ-μείψατο. The trimeter would then be parallel to O. T. 653. Headlam (J.P. xxxi 8) preferred to arrange and read thus: τὸ χρόσεον δὲ τὰς Δίκας | δέδορκεν ὄμμα, τὸν ἀδικον δ' ἀμείβεται.

2 Blaydes conjectured τὸν τ'.

13

ἄνθρωπός ἐστι πνεῦμα καὶ σκιά μόνον.

13 Stob. Flor. 98. 48 (iv p. 840, 14 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Αἰάντι (sic MA, Αἰάντι om. S) 'ἄνθρωπός... μόνον.' The line is referred to this play, as not being extant in the Ajax; but it is not unlikely, as Dindorf and van Leeuwen suggested, that the ascription Αἰάντι is an error. The latter thought that Αἰάντι was due to a slip of memory on the part of the anthologist, who had in mind Αἰ. 125, and that the true source of the quotation cannot be ascertained (de Ai. Soph. authentia, p. 119).

The epigram marks by two images the emptiness and unreality of human life: 'Vanity of vanities, saith the Preacher.' In Eccl. 1. 14 the R.V. has 'all is vanity and a striving after wind' (προαίρεσις πνεύματος LXX). But πνεῦμα is rarely used in this connexion, mere breath without any substance: cf. Phoenix Coloph. ap. Athen. 530 F ἐγὼ Νίκος πάλοι ποτ' ἐγενόμην πνεῦμα, | νῦν δ' οὐκ ἐστ' οὐδέν, ἀλλὰ γῇ πεποιήμαι. More familiar is ἀνέμος of things variable: Suid. s.v. ἀνέμου παιδίον, Eupolis fr. 376 (1 358 K.) ἀνέμος καὶ θλεθρὸς ἄνθρωπος.—σκιά, of things unsubstantial, is common: fr. 945. Eur. fr. 509 τί δ' ἄλλο; φωνὴ καὶ σκιά γέρον ἀνὴρ. Ai. 125 ὁρῶ γὰρ ἡμᾶς οὐδὲν ὄντας ἄλλο πλὴν | εἰδῶλ', ὅσον περ ἰῶμεν, ἢ κοῦφήν σκιάν. Eur. Med. 1224 τὰ θνητὰ δ' οὐ νῦν πρῶτον ἡγοῦμαι σκιάν. Or the notion is emphasised by some addition: fr. 659, 6 (n.) εἰδῶλον σκιάς, Ant. 1170 καπνοῦ σκιά. Pind. Pyth. 8. 95 ἐπάμεροι· τί δέ τις; τί δ' ὅστις; σκιάς ὅσαρ ἄνθρωπος.

For ἐστὶ Burney conjectured ἴσθι.

14

σοφοὶ τύραννοι τῶν σοφῶν ξυνουσία.

14 The verse is assigned to Sophocles by Libanius epist. 33. A fuller tradition gives the name of the play and discusses Plato's error: Zenob. s. 98 (Miller, Me-langes, p. 363; Crusius, Anal. p. 153) τοῦτο Σοφοκλέους ἐστὶν ἐξ Αἰάντος τοῦ Λοκροῦ. Πλάτων δὲ φησιν Εὐριπίδου εἶναι τὸ ἱαμβεῖον. καὶ οὐδὲν θαυμαστόν· συμπίπτουσι γὰρ ἀλλήλοις οἱ ποιηταί. This is almost identical with schol. Plat. rep. 568 A. The schol. on Ar. Thesm. 21 adds that Aristophanes in the Ἦρωες (fr. 308 1 471 K.) distinctly attributed the line to Euripides, and that Antisthenes as well as Plato did the same; he is quite at a loss to account for the confusion, but mentions the view of some (ὥσπερ ὑπονοοῦσι τινες) that the two poets by a coincidence hit on the same line. See also Aristid. II p. 373 Dind., who treats Plato's view as an error, and Aul. Gell. 13. 19. 1, who adds to the confusion by substituting the Thaetetus for the Theages as the dialogue containing the misquotation. On the other hand, Plato's attribution to Euripides is accepted by Stob. flor. 48. 5 (IV p. 251, 10 Hense), and hesitatingly by Themist. p. 72 c Εὐριπίδης ἢ οὐκ ἔστιν ὁ ποιήσας. Several late authorities, references to which will be found in Nauck, cite the line without giving the name of any author.

The circumstances detailed above raise a curious literary question, viz. why Plato (in Theag. 125 B and rep. 568 A) assigned a line to Euripides which was in fact written by Sophocles. We may leave out of account the possibility of coincidence, although Didymus is thought to have been responsible for this suggestion in criticising Aristophanes of Byzantium, who gave this v. as an instance of κλοπή (Nauck, Arist. Byz. p. 280). It is possible but not very likely that one poet was quoting from the other; so that an error, rendered still more remarkable from the fact that it was common also to Aristophanes and Antisthenes, is the only supposition remaining which will account for the facts. Adam (on rep. 568 A), while pointing out that such an error was more likely to take place in ancient times than it would be now, thinks that the cant use of σοφοί in Euripides made it all the easier.

The point of the line is that kings profit by the discourse of the wise men who flock to their courts. The typical instance is that of Simonides, who sojourned successively at the courts of Hippas, Scopas, and Hiero. Aristotle relates the anecdote that Simonides, questioned by Hiero's wife whether it is better to be wise or rich, replied in favour of the latter, on the ground that he was accustomed to see wise men spending their time at the gates of the rich (rhet. 2. 16. 1391^a 8 ff.). Poets are often called σοφοί in respect of their technical skill, but Simonides had considerable reputation as a moralist, and in this capacity he appears as giving advice to Hiero in Xenophon's dialogue of that name: cf. [Plat.] epist. 2 περὶ Ἱέρωνος ὅταν διαλέγωνται οἱ ἄνθρωποι καὶ Πανσανίου τοῦ Λακεδαιμονίου, χαίρουσι τὴν Σιμωνίδου ξυνουσίαν παραφέροντες ἃ τε ἐπραξε καὶ εἶπε πρὸς αὐτούς. Cf. generally Rhes. 206 σοφοῦ παρ' ἀνδρὸς χρή σοφόν τι μανθάνειν.

15

τί σοι ὁ Ἀπόλλων κεκιθάριεν;

15 τίσιν Macar. | ἐκίθαριεν Plut.

15 Zenob. 6. 14 (Miller, Milanges, p. 370): 'τί σοι ὁ Ἀπόλλων κεκιθάριεν;' τὸ 'κεκιθάριεν' οἷον ἐμαντεύσαστο ὡς φησιν Δισχύλος ἐν Αἰαντί Λοκρῷ. Suid. s.v.: 'τί σοι ὁ Ἀπόλλων κεκιθάριεν;' ἀντί τοῦ τί σοι ἐμαντεύσαστο. To the same effect Plut. prov. 1. 7, and Macar. 8. 37. Dindorf recognized that Δισχύλος was a mistake for Σοφοκλῆς, as the former did not write a play entitled Αἶας Λοκρός. Nauck suggested that the quotation should begin τί σοι δ' Ἀπόλλων, which is at least more metrical. It is generally considered that κεκιθάριεν is corrupt on the ground that oracles at Delphi were delivered by the voice of the Pythia, which is identified with that of the god: H., who thinks that either the reading or the explanation must be wrong, refers to Ar. Plut. 39 τί δῆτα Φοῖβος ἔλακεν ἐκ τῶν στεμμάτων; Hence Meineke (Theocr. 3 p. 463) conjectured τί

δῆτ' Ἀπόλλων σοι τεθρίακεν (cf. fr. 466), and Nauck, following him, ἐντεθρίακεν (coll. Hesych. II p. 108), which Dindorf approved. Cobet (Coll. Crit. p. 187), who says 'nihil horum est Sophocle dignum οὐδ' ἔγγυς,' actually proposes to read τί δῆτ' ὁ Φοῖβος ἔλακεν; I do not share these doubts. The harp and the bow are mentioned together with the prophetic function as the chief prerogatives of Apollo in Hom. h. Ap. 131 εἴη μοι κίθαρις τε φῖλη καὶ καμπύλα τόξα, | χρῆσθω δ' ἀνθρώποισι Διὸς νημερτέα βουλήν, where Gemoll quotes Callim. h. Ap. 44 Φοῖβω γάρ καὶ τόξον ἐπιτρέπεται καὶ αὐδῆ, | κίθου δὲ Θραὶ καὶ μάντιες. His oracles were ἔμμετρα and μέλη, and as such properly accompanied by the κίθαρις, and referred to the god of music and song: see Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 1253. This connexion is explicitly acknowledged by Plutarch:

Pyth. or. 5 p. 396 C καίτοι μουσηγέτης ὁ θεός, καὶ τῆς λεγομένης λογιότητος οὐχ ἦττον αὐτῷ καλὸν ἢ τῆς περὶ μέλη καὶ ὥδας εὐφρονίας μετέβαιναι. ib. 6 p. 397 A τάχα δὴ μεμψόμεθα τὴν Πυθίαν, ὅτι Γλαύκης οὐ φθέγγεται τῆς κιθαρωδοῦ λιγυρώτερον. If the Pythia was κιθαρωδός, it is not surprising that Apollo, who was represented in art both as κιθαριστής and κιθαρωδός, should be said κιθαρίζειν in his mantic capacity. The citharoede is the interpreter of the citharis, as the προφήτης interprets the μάντις. Cf. Pind. fr. 150 (of the muse of the poet) μαρτεῖο Μοῖσα, πρ. φατεῖσσω δ' ἐγώ. — Blaydes conjectured τί νυν Ἀπόλλων σοι κεκιθάριεν νέον;

16

καὶ πεζὰ καὶ φορμικτὰ

16 Schol. Eur. Alc. 446 οὐρείαν χέλυν] ... τούτῃσι μετὰ λύρας. καὶ παρὰ Σοφοκλεί ἐν Αἰάντι Δοκρῷ 'καὶ πεζὰ καὶ φορμικτὰ.' This is usually regarded as the only extant example of the word πεζός being applied to rhythmical verse unaccompanied by music. But the same use actually occurs in Plat. soph. 237 A ἀρχόμενος δὲ καὶ διὰ τέλους τοῦτο ἀπεμαρτύρατο (Παρμενίδης) πεζῇ τε ὥδε ἐκάστοτε λέγων καὶ μετὰ μέτρων· οὐ γὰρ μήποτε τοῦτο δαμῇ, φησὶν, κτέ. (fr. 7 D), where the commentators unnecessarily suppose that oral teaching is referred to. Nor is there any reason why we should interpret otherwise Com. fr. adespr. 601 III 516 K. παῦσαι μελωδοῦσ', ἀλλὰ πεζῇ μοι φράσον, or the gloss of Phot. lex. p. 405, 17 πεζῷ γόφῃ ἀνευ αὐλοῦ ἢ λύρας. The meaning here is perfectly clear, though Campbell seems inclined to think that the word may have its common later sense of prose; for the passage of Sophocles was quoted to illustrate the text of Euripides which proceeds μέλψουσι καθ' ἐπτάτονδ' ὅρεϊαν | χέλυν, ἐν τ' ἀλυσίαις κλέοντες ὕμνοι, and the critics are no doubt right in referring the later words to the rhapsodists. Thus πεζὰ (ἐπη) is the same as Plato's ψιλὴ ποίησις (Phaedr. 278 C), or μαθήματα ἄλυσρα ποιητῶν κείμενα ἐν γράμμασι, τοῖς μὲν μετὰ μέτρων (legg. 810 B), and Aristotle's φιλομετρία (poet. 2 1448^a 10). The schol. adds a pertinent illustration (see also Phot. lex. 5. vii. πεζὰς μύσους and πεζῇ, and Etym. M. p. 658, 36), according to which the adjective was jestingly applied to heterae; καὶ πεζαὶ δὲ τινες ἐταῖραι λέγονται, αἱ χωρὶς ὀργάνου εἰς τὰ συμποσία φοιτοῦσιν.

Blaydes suggests φορμικτὰ, comparing σαλπικτῆς: but Meisterhans² p. 84 shows that inscriptions always have σαλπικτῆς.

17

'Ελλάς

17 Antiatl. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 97, 4 'Ελλάς ὁ ἀνὴρ. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰάντι Δοκρῷ. H. shows that this is an error of the Antiatl. in which he does not stand alone. 'Ελλάς is a fem. adjective similar to πεδιάς, ὄργας, Τρῳάς, Ἀσιάς, Φθιάς, Ἀττικῇ, and so forth; and it is difficult to believe without definite proof that it was used for Ἕλλην. The cause of the misunderstanding appears to have been that οὐθ' Ἕλλάς οὔτε βάρβαρος or τίς Ἕλλάς ἢ βάρβαρος, with or without γῆ, were phrases commonly employed; Dem. 9. 27 οὐθ' ἢ Ἕλλάς οὐθ' ἢ βάρβαρος τὴν πλεονεξίαν χωρεῖ. Max. Tyr. 6. 3 εἰ που καὶ γένοντο τῆς Ἑλλάδος ἢ τῆς βαρβάρου γῆς. The transition to the idea of a person is found in Trach. 1060 οὐθ' Ἕλλάς οὐτ' ἀγλασσοῦ οὐθ' ὄσσην ἐγώ |

γαῖαν καθαίρων ἱκόμην ἔδρασε πω, | γυνὴ δέ... where ἀγλασσοῦ is a synonym for βάρβαρος (Pind. Isth. 6. 24 οὐδ' ἔστιν οὕτω βάρβαρος οὔτε παλιγγλασσοῦ πόλις). Here it is evident that what is to be understood with Ἕλλάς is γαῖα, but since the meaning is no inhabitant of such a land, the transition to a person is easy. So in Eur. Phoen. 1509 τίς Ἕλλάς ἢ βάρβαρος ἢ τῶν προπαροῦθ' εὐγενετῶν ἔτερος ἔτλα...; although we pass to ἕτερος, we shall hardly doubt that τίς Ἕλλάς = 'what Hellenic land?' Yet there the scholiasts vary: one rightly says τίς Ἑλληνικὴ γῆ, another has τίς Ἑλληνικὴ ἢ βάρβαρος, δηλοῦντι γυνή, another ἄγουν τίς τῶν ἀνθρώπων, ἢ Ἕλλην ἢ βάρβαρος, yet another, γρ. τίς Ἕλλην.

18

δατούμενος

18 Schol. Aeschin. 2. 121 p. 65, 7 Dind. διέβαλλε δὲ κάκεινον διαιρούμενος τὸν λόγον] οἶονεῖ σαφῶς λέγων καὶ ἀντικρυσ κατὰ διαίρεσιν καὶ φανερώς· ἢ ὑπομερίζων καὶ διαβάλλων (διαλαμβάνων conj. Nauck) ὡς Σοφοκλῆς Αἰαντι φάσκων 'δατούμενος'. τὸ γὰρ αὐτὸ δύναται.

Schneidewin (Coni. Crit. p. 102) concluded that the scholiast had made a mistake, and that the passage which he really had in his mind was Trach. 791 τὸ δυσπάρεινον λέκτρον ἐνδατούμενος | σοῦ τῆς ταλαίνης. Dindorf was of the same opinion; but their inference is too hasty. There is no reason why Sophocles should not have used δατούμενος in the same sense as ἐνδατούμενος; and we have no sufficient ground for suspecting the scholiast of a double error. The metaphor in ἐνδατεῖσθαι is clearly explained by the schol. on Trach. l.c. σφοδρῶς λοιδορούμενος· ἐνδατεῖσθαι γὰρ σφοδρῶς ἐσθλῆιν. λοιδορῶν, μεμφόμενος, κατὰ μέρος τῶν λεγομένων ἀνακαλῶν· ἐνδατεῖσθαι γὰρ τὸ μερίσασθαι, ἢ δὲ μεταφορὰ ἀπὸ τῶν δαινυμένων. To the same effect but more briefly Hesych. 11 p. 89 ἐνδατεῖται· ἀπομερίζει (l. ὑπομερίζει)...ἐνδατούμενος· μεριζόμενος καὶ οἶονεῖ κακῶς λέγων σφοδρῶς. ἀπὸ τῆς δαιτός. [These extracts show clearly that Nauck was wrong in conjecturing διαλαμβάνων in schol. Aeschin. The annotators there doubted whether διαιρούμενος meant 'accurately defining' or 'dividing up and so censuring,' and quoted δατούμενος in Soph. in support of the latter view. The words of the scholiast, as printed in Dindorf's Poet. Scenici, are unintelligible, owing to a strange dislocation of their order. There is no variation in the MSS, except that cod. F does not contain the second part of the note.] Lycophr. 155 τὸν ὠλενίτην χόνδρον ἐνδατουμένην, 'chewing the shoulder muscles,' testifies to the literal meaning. Hence, through the ideas of repetition and insistence, is developed the metaphorical sense of 'to dwell upon,' as applied to abstract ideas or to speech: see Verrall and Tucker on Aesch. Theb. 565. The notion of blame is not essential to the figurative meaning of ἐνδατεῖσθαι, and the same was probably true of the simple verb, although the evidence is defective. The Latin phrases differre or discerpere dictis, like our 'to pick to pieces,' arose in a different way: cf. διασῶρα. Observe also that the English 'to mince' acquired the sense of 'to depreciate (a matter)' by yet another course of development.

ΑΙΓΕΥΣ

Casaubon on Athen. 122 F seems to have thought that the early adventure of Aegeus at Troezen related in Plut. Thes. 3 was the subject-matter of Sophocles' play. But, as Welcker (p. 394) remarks, the material is only sufficient for the beginning of a tragedy. Of the six fragments which are cited from the play four clearly refer to the journey made by Theseus to Athens for the purpose of discovering his father, and the dangers which he encountered before his identity was established. This fact leaves little doubt as to the period covered by the story, and makes it probable that the ἀναγνώρισις of Theseus formed the climax of the action rather than the death of Aegeus after the return from Crete. It is thus impossible to agree with Wernicke (in Pauly-Wissowa I 954) that the contents of this play are entirely unknown; and it rather appears that Ahrens was right in supposing that the plot was similar to that of the Euripidean Aegeus, which culminated in the recognition of Theseus and the discomfiture of Medea (Plut. Thes. 12). But the new fragment (fr. 25) relating to the capture of the Marathonian bull is of peculiar importance, as showing that in Sophocles this adventure preceded the recognition, instead of occurring at a later period according to the account of Plutarch (Thes. 14). In the Hecale of Callimachus it happened in the lifetime of Aegeus, but was subsequent (it would seem) to the recognition: see Cl. Rev. VII 429 Θησεὺς οὐχ ἑκὰς υἱὸς ἀπ' εὐύδρου Μαραθῶνος | ζῶν ἄγων τὸν ταῦρον, and cf. Diod. 4 59, where Aegeus receives and sacrifices the bull. But in Apollod. epit. 1. 5 Medea warns Aegeus to beware of Theseus, who is accordingly sent against the bull; on the victorious return of Theseus, the attempted poisoning and the recognition follow. Ov. Met. 7. 434 gives the same order of events. Thus, Apollodorus confirms the statement of Myth. Vat. 1. 48 that Theseus was sent against the bull at the direct instigation of Medea, and we may conjecture that Sophocles adopted this version. The disappearance of Medea's agency in other accounts is attributed by Gruppe (p. 580₃) to the influence of Euripides, who did not include the Marathonian adventure¹. The considerations which have been mentioned justify us in restoring fr. 24 to the Aegeus, from which Nauck in his second edition separated it; and it is probable that fr. 905 also belongs here.

19

Ταύρειον πῶμα

19 πῶμα cod.: corr. Nauck

19 Athen. 122 F τὸ δὲ Ταύρειον ὕδωρ ἀνόμασεν... Σοφοκλῆς Αἰγεί (ἐν γὰρ cod., corrected to ἐν Αἰγεί by Casaubon, to Αἰγεί by Schweighäuser) ἀπὸ τοῦ περὶ Τροϊζήνα ποταμοῦ Ταύρου, παρ' ᾧ καὶ κρήνη τις ὕδωρ καλεῖται. To the same effect but without the name of the play Eustath. Il. p. 881, 22, who copied the epitome of Athenaeus. With the help of Athenaeus Casaubon corrected the corrupt gloss of Hesych. IV p. 133 Ταύρειον πῶμα· ἀπὸ αἰγεί ταύρου ποταμοῦ Σοφοκλῆς Τροϊζήνα πάρα καὶ κρήνη ὕδωρ <περὶ> Τροϊζήνα, παρ' ᾧ καὶ κρήνη ὕδωρ.

From these facts it has rightly been inferred that the lemma of Hesych. represents the text of Sophocles, but πῶμα (Nauck) should be restored in place of the later substitute πῶμα: see Cobet, N. L. p. 455, V. L. p. 85. M. Schmidt preferred σῶμα. It should be added that Athenaeus shortly before (122 A), after quoting Ar. Eq. 83 f., adds οὐ γὰρ ἀν εἰποιμι Ταύρειον ὕδωρ πῶμα, ὅπερ σὺ οὐκ οἶσθα τί ἐστίν. Brunnk strangely inferred that Athen. and Hesych. were really quoting fr. 178, which he accordingly supposed to have belonged to the Aegeus, substituting πῶμα Ταύρειον for αἶμα ταύρειον.

Pausanias (2. 31. 7) mentions that the

¹ R. Wagner's theory (Epit. Vat. p. 125) that Euripides was the first to connect it with Medea is altogether improbable.

source of the river Hyllicus, which was originally known by the name Taurus, was to be found on the mountain path leading to Hermione, and that in the same neighbourhood was the rock called after Theseus, because he found beneath it the sandals and sword of Aegeus. This is enough to show that an allusion to the river Taurus is appropriate to the subject of Sophocles' play. For the situation of the Hyllicus see Frazer's Pausanias, III p. 279.

20

κέστρα σιδηρὰ πλευρὰ καὶ κατὰ ῥάχιν
παίων ἀπηλόησε

20. 2 παίων ἀπηλόησε scripsi: ἡλοῖσαι πλείων codcl., ἤλαυσε παίων Casaubon, ὕν ἡλόησα M. Schmidt, ἥθλησε (vel ἥθλησα) παίων Nauck, ἤλαυσε παίων Herwerden, ἡλόησα (vel -ε) λείων Mekler

20 Pollux 10. 160 καὶ κέστρα δὲ σφύρας τι εἶδος σιδηρῶν, ὡς ἐν Αἰγεί Σοφοκλῆς 'κέστρα... πλείων.' Hesych. II p. 470 κέστριαί σιδηραὶ no doubt refer to v. 1, but the explanation has fallen out. Just before he has κέστρα ἀμυντήριον ὄπλον. σφύρα. Hartung interpreted these words as referring to Periphetes, called also Corynetes, whom Theseus overthrew in the first of his contests not far from Epidaurus. This view might be supported from Apollod. 3. 217, where his weapon is described as κορυνὴν σιδηρῶν; but two of the recently discovered authorities establish beyond doubt that the allusion is to Procrustes (or Procoptes), who fitted his victims to the bed provided for them either by cutting off the extremities of those who were too big, or by hammering out the bodies of those who were too small. The duplicated name corresponds to the double function. His weapon, at any rate for the beating-out process, was a hammer: see Bacchyl. 17. 27 Πολυμήμονος τε καρτερὰν σφύραν ἐξέβαλεν Προκόπτας. Apollod. epit. 1. 4 τοὺς μὲν βραχεῖς... σφύραις ἐτυπτεν. Similarly Hygin. fab. 28 incudibus stirpositis extendebat. Schol. Eur. Hipp. 977, confusing Sinis and Procrustes, says of the former: μετὰ σφύρας ἀπέκοπτε τοὺς πόδας.

1 κατὰ must be taken ἀπὸ κοινού with πλευρὰ as well as with ῥάχιν. Cf. Alcman fr. 22 φολίαις δὲ καὶ ἐν θιάσοισιν, Pind. Nem. 10. 38 χαρίτεσσι τε καὶ σὺν Τυνδαρίδαις, Eur. Helid. 756, Phoen. 284, Soph. O. T. 734, fr. 314. 367.

2 The reading is very uncertain (see cr. n.); but πλείων is in any case untenable, and Casaubon's παίων has a high degree of probability. On the other hand, ἡλόησε (-ῆσαι codcl.) is too good to be due to accident, and the metre may be restored by an alteration in the order of the words, and the introduction of the Homeric compound ἀπηλο(ί)ησεν, which is used (Δ 522) of the crushing of a man's leg by a rock hurled at him. Mekler's conj. assumes that the lines are trochaic with -- missing at the beginning of the first; but that metre does not seem suitable to a descriptive passage.

21

κλύω μὲν οὐκ ἔγωγε, χωρίτην δ' ὄρω

21 κλύω μὲν Meineke: ἐκλύωμεν cod. R, ἐκλύομεν vulg. | δ' Meineke: γ' cod. R, σ' vulg.

21 Steph. llyz. s. v. χώρα p. 699, 11 χωρίτης, ὡς ἀπὸ τοῦ ἔδρα ἐδρίτης, ἐσπέρα ἐσπερίτης. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰγεί 'ἐκλύωμεν... ὄρω.'

I have followed Meineke, but without any confidence; for the absence of a context makes restoration peculiarly difficult here. Brunck read ἐκλύομεν. οὐκ ἔγωγε χωρίτην σ' ὄρω, and Hartung accepts this, supposing that Theseus is thus greeted on his arrival. But the emphasis so thrown on ἐγωγε seems unnatural. Blaydes prefers χωρίτης δ' ὅρᾳ (or ὁρῶ). The meaning of the text may be 'I do not learn by hearsay, but see with my own eyes that you are a native,' with the same contrast as in Trach. 747, Phil. 681 and elsewhere; or 'though I don't hear your voice, I can see' etc., in which case we might compare

O.C. 139, 1642, Phil. 1412. Meineke, however, thought that in reply to a remark by his interlocutor that he heard the sound of shouting, the speaker said that he himself had heard nothing, but now saw a native approaching.—χωρίτην, a fellow-countryman: cf. Aesch. Eum. 1035. For the word see on fr. 92.

22

πῶς δηθ' ὀδοῦρὸν οἶος ἐξέβης λαθῶν;

22 ὀδοῦρὸν οἶος Valckenaer: ὀδοῦρῶν (ὀδοῦρὸν CP) ὁμοιος codd., ὀδοῦρῶν σμήνος Nauck

22 Schol. Pind. Pyth. 2. 57 πειρατὰς τοὺς κατὰ πέλαγος λήστας λέγομεν, κυρίως δὲ τοὺς ἐν ὁδοῖς καλουροῦντας, παρ' ὃ δὴ καὶ ὀδοῦρους αὐτοὺς λέγουσιν. Εὐρυπίδης ἐν Ἀρχελαῷ (fr. 260) 'ἔπανο' ὀδοῦρους λυμεῶνας.' καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Αἰγεί 'πῶς...λαθῶν;'

This may be taken to refer to Sciron, who infested the Scironian cliffs in the neighbourhood of Megara; and ἐξέβης (ὡδ' ἐβης conj. Blaydes) would then express the successful crossing of the 'Evil Staircase' (Eur. Helid. 860 n.). Otherwise, Nauck's ὀδοῦρῶν σμήνος, 'nest of robbers,' is an attractive conjecture, and ὁδοῦ or the like might have been the noun to be supplied with ἐξέβης. Less probable conjectures are ὀδοῦρῶν δυματ' (Wakefield), ὀδοῦρῶν οἶμον (Kock), ὀδοῦρῶν δυορος (R. Ellis), ὀδοῦρῶν δμαδον (Mekler).—ὀδοῦρῶν, highwayman. Later synonyms were ὁδοῦδός and ὁδοστάτης, but ὀδοῦρός soon became obsolete: cf. οὔρος, ἐπίουρος, φρουρός.

23

ὥσπερ γὰρ ἐν φύλλοισιν αἰγείρου μακρᾶς, κᾶν ἄλλο μηδέν, ἀλλὰ τοῦκείνης κάρα κινήσαν αὔρας κανάκουφίζει πτερόν

23. 1 ἐν φύλλοισιν M: εὐφύλλοισιν V 2 τῆς κείνης M 3 κινήσαν αὔρας scripsi: κινήσης αὔρας codd. | κανάκουφίζει Brunck: ἀνακουφίζει codd.

23 Schol. Oil. η 106 τὰ φύλλα τῆς αἰγείρου...εὐκίνητα ῥαδίως καὶ ὑπὸ (τῆς) τυχεύσεως (the addition of τῆς is Nauck's correction) αὔρας, ὡς Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Αἰγεί (so Heath for ἐναργῶς or ἐν Ἀργεί of the MSS) 'ὥσπερ...πτερόν.'

1 ff. The last line is certainly corrupt (see cr. n.), and has not hitherto been satisfactorily emended. The following points should be observed: (1) it appears to be certain that ἄλλο μηδέν and κάρα are both accusatives, so that the subject is to be looked for in v. 3. At any rate, the order of the words shows that τοῦκείνης κάρα bears the main emphasis, and is co-ordinated and contrasted with ἄλλο μηδέν: see n. on fr. 940 εἰ σώμα δοῖλον, ἀλλ' ὁ νοῦς ἐλεύθερος, and Headlam on Aesch. Ag. 357 ff. (2) With κᾶν must be supplied κινήση or whatever may be the verb in v. 3: cf. Ar. Ach. 1021 μέτρησον εἰρήνης τί μοι, κᾶν πέντ' ἔτη. (3) The words ἐν φύλλοισιν have a certain awkwardness; and clearly they do not qualify the clause κᾶν ἄλλο μηδέν. Thus the general sense would be 'even if the breeze is so light as to stir nothing else, it sways the poplar's head amidst its foliage,'—in summer as well as in winter. But it is difficult to see how ἐν φύλλοισιν can be made to cohere with πτερόν, if the latter is interpreted leafage (L. and S.).

Hence conjectures like F. W. Schmidt's ὡς ἐν θυέλλαισιν γάρ, and several of Blaydes. (4) That κάρα is the object of ἀνακουφίζει is suggested, if not required, by O. T. 23 (πόλις) σαλεύει κάνακουφίσαι κάρα | βυθῶν ἐπ' οὐχ οἷα τε φονίου σάλου. Thus the lines express more than the schol. states, the quivering of poplar leaves in the breeze (Ov. Am. 1. 7. 54 ut cum populeas ventilat aura comas, Her. 14. 40); but their truth to nature, as interpreted above, is within everyone's observation. Dindorf's elegant conjecture κινεῖ τις αἶρα (with κάνακουφίζει, which seems inevitable) is accepted by Nauck, but it does not get over the difficulty of πτερόν. The same remark applies to Tucker's ingenious supplement to Dindorf's correction, τοὺν κείνης κάρα for τοῦ κείνης κάρα. Blaydes, making κάρα subject, proposed κινηθέν αἶραις ὡς πτερόν κουφίζεται (or τὴν κέμην ἀναπτεροῖ), as well as several other alternatives. Herwerden reads κλίνει τις αἶρα κάνακουφίζει πείσῳ, where κλίνει, although otherwise attractive, is less suited than κινεῖ to supply a verb to καὶν ἄλλο μηδέν. See also Babr. 36. 12 καὶν βαῖον ἡμῶν ἄνεμος ἄκρα κινήσῃ.

F. W. Schmidt altered πτερόν to ρέπον, Gomperz to πάλιν. But I do not think that πτερόν is likely to be corrupt, and prefer to suppose that it refers to the 'wings of the wind' (see Psalms 18. 10, 104. 3), reading κινῆσαν αἶρας, and making αἶρας πτερόν the subject to ἀνακουφίζει, which is merely emphasized by καί (Trach. 490, Phil. 380). The metaphor is none too bold for Sophocles; wind-gods such as Boreas were regularly represented in fifth century art as winged. In Latin literature there are many parallels: cf. e.g. Ov. Met. 1. 264 madidis Notus evolat alis, and see Thesaurus i 1465, 50. It is possible that this was M. Schmidt's view, who in Philol. xviii 229 f. proposed to read πτερόν for πτερόν, but he gives no explanation of his conjecture. Wecklein's κινῆ τις αἶρα, πάντα κουφίζει πτερόν (i.e. 'omnia tolluntur') is condemned by the awkwardness of πτερόν. H., who thought that the subj. κινήσῃ was due to καὶν in the previous line, suggested κινήσῃ αἶραι; but we cannot do without αἶρα.

24

ὤρισεν πατήρ

ἐμοὶ μὲν ἀκτὰς τῆσδε γῆς <ἀποικίσαι,> πρεσβεῖα νέμας· <εἴτ> α..... Λύκω

24. 1 πατήρ ὤρισεν Strab. 2 ἐμοὶ μὲν α... εἰς ἀκτὰς τῆσδε γῆς Strab. | ἀποικίσαι add. H. 3 εἴτα supplavit Meineke

24 Strabo 392 οἱ τε δὴ τὴν Ἀτθίδα συγγράψαντες, πολλὰ διαφωνοῦντες, τοῦτό γε ὁμολογοῦσιν, ὅτι γε λόγου ἕξιοι, ὅτι τῶν Πανδιονιδῶν τεττάρων ὄντων, Αἰγέως τε καὶ Λύκου καὶ Παλλαντος καὶ τετάρτου Νίσου, καὶ τῆς Ἀττικῆς εἰς τέτταρα μέρη διαιρεθείσης, ὁ Νίσος τὴν Μεγαρίδα λάχος καὶ κτίσαι τὴν Νίσαιαν. Φιλόχορος (FHG 1 389) μὲν οὖν ἀπὸ Ἰσθμοῦ μέχρι τοῦ Πυθίου διέκειν αὐτοῦ φησὶ τὴν ἀρχὴν· Ἀνδρῶν (FHG 1 351) δὲ μέχρι Ἐλευσίνος καὶ τοῦ Θριασίου πεδίου. τὴν δ' εἰς τέτταρα διανομήν, ἄλλων ἄλλως εἰρηκότων, ἀρκεῖ ταῦτα παρὰ Σοφοκλέους λαβεῖν· φησὶ δ' ὁ Αἰγέως ὅτι ὁ πατήρ ὤρισεν ἐμοὶ μὲν α..... εἰς ἀκτὰς τῆσδε γῆς πρεσβεῖα νέμας..... α Λύκω τὸν ἀντίπλευρον..... Παλλας.

This fragment was formerly assigned to the Aegeus with general consent; but Nauck, who in his 1st edition followed the common opinion, subsequently changed his mind, and without giving any reason spoke of the ascription as 'improbable.' I cannot see to what play the words are appropriate, if not to the Aegeus, especially now that our data have been enlarged in regard to the scope of the play: see Introductory Note. The reference to Pallas points in the same direction, as may be seen from Plut. Thes. 13.

There is not very much direct evidence, apart from this passage of Strabo, touching the fourfold division of Attica between the sons of Pandion. The most explicit statement to be found elsewhere is in schol. Ar. Lys. 58 διήρητο γὰρ εἰς δ' ἑκάστης τὸ παλαιὸν ἢ Ἀττικῇ. Πανδίων γὰρ διαξέμενος τὴν Κέκροπος βασιλείαν, προσκτησάμενος δὲ καὶ τὴν Μεγαρίδα, ἐνεμε τὴν χώραν τοῖς παῖσιν εἰς δ' ἑκάστης Αἰγέω μὲν

τὸν ἀντίπλευρον κῆπον Εὐβοίας νέμει·
 Νίσω δὲ τὴν ὀμαυλον ἐξαιρεῖ χθόνα 5
 Σκίρωνος ἀκτῆς· τῆς δὲ γῆς τὸ πρὸς νότον ὁ σκληρὸς οὗτος καὶ γίγαντας ἐκτρέφω εἴληχε Πάλλας.

4 νέμει Coraes; νέμων vulgo, litteris μων in cod. A. m. sec. suppletis 6 ὀμαυλον et ὀμαλον al. 6 Σκίρωνος Strab.

τὴν παρὰ (l. περί) τὸ ἄστυ μέχρι Πυθίου, Πάλλαντι δὲ τὴν παραλίαν, Λύκω δὲ τὴν Διακρίαν, Νίσω δὲ τὴν Μεγαρίδα. The allusion to the Pythion in the Daphne pass, where a monastery afterwards stood, indicates that Philochorus is the ultimate source of the scholiast. Briefer but to the same effect, though without the words μέχρι Πυθίου, is schol. Ar. Vesp. 1223. The schol. on Eur. Hipp. 35, who derives other parts of his note from Philochorus, has a garbled account, omitting Lycus, and giving no explanation of the divided rule. A somewhat different version appears in Apollod. 3. 206, which agrees with Pausan. 1. 5. 4. 39. 4. According to this, the four sons divided the country between themselves after the death of Pandion, when they had returned to Athens and expelled the Metionidae: Apollodorus illustrates Soph. by concluding with the words εἶχε δὲ τὸ πᾶν κράτος Αἰγέως.

'Aegeus speaks: πατήρ is Pandion. 1. Aegeus obtained the capital, Athens, with the Athenian plains, and the coast of those plains which was specially called Ἀκτὴ (Dict. Geo. 1 p. 322: cp. Strabo 9 p. 391), the ἄστυ, the πεδιάς, and the ἀκτὴ. 2. Lycus got the Διακρία, the highland district in the N.E. of Attica, between Parnes, Pentelicus and the sea. 3. Nisus got Megaris, where he founded Nisaea the sea port. 4. Pallas got τὸ πρὸς νότον—i.e. the southern coasts, from Sunium to Cape Brauron on one side (the E.) and to C. Zoster on the other—the παραλία.

This legendary division must have had a basis of fact. After the Megarid had been reft from Attica, the three other divisions are found corresponding with political parties in the sixth century B.C.—the Πεδιεῖς, the Ἰπάραιοι, and the Διᾶκριοι (Hdt. 1. 59: Plut. Solon 13, Dict. Geo. 11 p. 324.) (J.)

1 ff. These lines cannot be restored with any certainty, more particularly as the tradition of Strabo is mutilated: see

cr. nn. (1) Meineke (followed by Nauck) gave: ἐμοὶ μὲν ὤρσεν πατήρ | ἀκτὰς ἀπελθεῖν τῆσδε γῆς... | πρεσβεῖα νέμει... εἶτα... Λύκω. He would fill up the gaps with προσεσπέρους and δευτέρω. (2) Casaubon conj. and Brunck edited: πατήρ δ' ἀπελθεῖν ὤρσ' εἰς ἀκτὴν ἐμοί, | πρεσβεῖα νέμει τῆσδε γῆς· τῷ δ' αὖ Λύκω—but the combination ἐμοὶ μὲν ought to be kept. (3) J. suggests either ἐμοὶ μὲν ἄρχειν (or ἄρχην) ὤρσ' εἰς ἀκτὰς πατὴρ or ἐμοὶ μὲν ὤρσεν πατήρ | ἀκτὰς ἀνάσσειν τῆσδε γῆς κектημένω. (4) Blaydes conjectured τυραννεῖν or ἐνοικεῖν for ἀπελθεῖν and wished to introduce παρακτίας.—Lycus was subsequently driven out by Aegeus (Pausan. 1. 19. 3).

4 ἀντίπλευρον, opposite, c. gen. Strabo speaks of Attica as a triangle with three πλευραὶ (or πλευρά); the second which is μηροειδής extends as far as Oropus in Boeotia,—τοῦτο δ' ἐστὶ τὸ δεύτερον πλευρὸν ἐφ' ὃν τῆς Ἀττικῆς (p. 391)—κῆπον, 'domain,' as in fr. 956, 3.

6 ὀμαυλος is similarly applied to persons in a satyr-play of uncertain authorship (Ox. Pap. 1083, fr. 1. 8): see also Hesych. 111 p. 201 has ὀμαυλον· ὀμβκοῖτον, ὀμοῦ αὐλίζομενον, and cf. fr. 717, Aesch. Cho. 597 ἐνδ' ὄνους δ' ὀμαυλας.—ἐξαιρεῖ; the act. is used of the donor, and the middle of the recipient. See Jebb on Trach. 245. Hdt. 4. 161 τῷ βασιλεὶ Βάττω τεμένει ἐξελών.

6 Σκίρωνος ἀκτῆς. The genitive is governed by ὀμαυλον as γελτόνα. For the Scironian rocks see on fr. 905. The route extending for about six miles along the cliffs between Megara and the Eleusinian plain, and known in modern times as the 'Evil Staircase,' is described in Frazer's Pausanias, II p. 546 f.—For the form Σκίρων (not Σκείρων) cf. Callim. fr. 378. That the form with ι is the older is attested by inscriptions on stone (CIG 7723) and vases (Gruppe, p. 599b).—τὸ πρὸς νότον. Blaydes should not have conjectured νότον, for the accusative is well established: see Kuehner-Gerth I 515.

7 ε. The fifty sons of Pallas had already plotted against Aegeus before the appearance of Theseus, wishing to secure for themselves the succession to the throne (Plut. Thes. 3). Subsequently, Pallas and his sons revolted against Theseus (Pausan. 1. 22. 2), but were destroyed by him (Apollod. epit. 1. 11, Plut. Thes. 13, Pausan. 1. 28. 10, Eur. Hipp. 35).—The description of Pallas's sons as giants is very remarkable, and the reason is not plain. We may note, however, the following coincidences which link the legend of the battle between the giants and the gods with the defeat of the Pallantidae (Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 438). (1) Athena was called Pallas because she slew a giant of that name: Suid. s.v. Πάλλας, Etym. M. p. 640, 54; cf. Apollod. 1. 37. (2) As the Chalcidic Pallene was the scene of the giants' defeat, so Theseus destroyed the Pallantidae at the Attic Pallene (Plut. l.c.). (3) Two of Pallas's sons were named Clytus and Butes (Ov. Met. 7. 500), two of the giants Clytus and Botes. It is further to be observed that Tzetzes theog. Matranga II 580 calls Aegeus and Hippolytus giants. It may be, however, that the Pallantidae are called γίγαντες in virtue of their insolent opposition to authority; in the case of Capaneus (Aesch. Theb. 411, quoted by J.) the significance of the name is obvious.

25

κλωστήρσι χειρῶν ὀργάσας κατήνυσσε
σειραῖα δεσμά.

25 Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 64, 8 ἀκοῦσαι ὀργῶν καθόλου δὲ ποικίλως χρώνται τῷ ὀνόματι· καὶ γὰρ ἐπὶ τοῦ βρόχου, ὡς Ἀρχιλόχου, Αἰσχύλου δὲ ἐπὶ τοῦ παλίουτα ἐξελαυνεῖν καὶ μαλάττειν τίθησι, Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Αἰγεί <φρῆσι> τὸν Θησέα στρέφοντα καὶ μαλάττοντα τοὺς λόγους ποιῆσαι δεσμὰ τῷ ταύρῳ. λέγει δὲ οὕτως· 'κλωστήρσι...δεσμά.'

The extract clearly relates to the adventure of the Marathonian bull, and shows that it formed a part of the plot of the Aegeus: see Introductory Note. Theseus did not kill the bull on the spot, but captured it and drove it back to the city, where it was subsequently sacrificed to Athena or Apollo: cf. Plut. Thes. 14 χειρωσάμενος ἐπέδειξεντο ῥῶντα διὰ τοῦ ἄστεως ἐλάσας, εἶτα τῷ Ἀπόλλωνι τῷ Δελφινίῳ κατέβυσεν. Pausan. 1. 27. 9 τὸν δὲ ἐν τῷ Μαραθῶνι ταύρον ὑπερον Θησεὺς ἐς

τὴν ἀκρόπολιν ἐλάσαι καὶ θύσαι λέγεται τῇ θεῷ. The words of Sophocles describe the preparation of the cords by which the bull was led. κλωστήρσι χειρῶν is hand-made twittings (of withies). Cf. Pollux 7. 31 κλωστήρ· οὕτω δὲ καὶ τὴν περιστροφὴν τοῦ λίνου Εὐριπίδης ὠνόμασεν (fr. 1001), λίνον κλωστήρα περιφέρει λαβῶν. Eur. Tro. 537 κλωστοῦ δ' ἀμφιβόλοισι λίνου, of the ropes used to pull the Trojan horse into the city. For ὀργάσας cf. frs. 482, 787 and for σειραῖα Eur. Her. 1011 σὺν τῷ γέροντι δεσμὰ σειραίων βρόχων | ἀνῆπτομεν πρὸς κίονα.

Reitzenstein thinks that the extract is made from a somewhat lengthy discussion of ὀργάζω, and assigns it to Phrynichus on the strength of Bekk. anecd. p. 7, 3 and p. 53, 31.

ΑΙΓΙΣΘΟΣ

The evidence connecting Sophocles with a play bearing this title is so doubtful that it is idle to speculate as to its contents. Livius Andronicus wrote an Aegisthus, which apparently was based on the Homeric version of Agamemnon's murder; and Accius an Aegisthus as well as a Clytaemestra: Ribbeck, *TRF*³ pp. 1, 161. See also Introductory Note to the Iphigenia.

26

ἡλιωπὸς οὐρανός

26 Philodem. de pict. p. 22 G. <Αἰσχύνος> δ' ἐν Ἑλλά<σιν τὸν> Δία καὶ αἰθέ<ρα λέγει κ>αὶ γῆν καὶ <οὐρανὸν> καὶ τὰ πάν<τα καὶ ὅ>πῃ τὰ πάν<τα>. Εὐριπίδης δ' ἐν Μυ<σείοις καὶ> τὸν Δία καὶ <οὐρανὸν> ἡλιωπὸν, <Σοφοκλῆς> δ' Αἰγίσθω <οὐρανὸν μ>όνον, ἐν Οἰ<κῇ δὲ καὶ τ>ὸν Δία.

Such is the restoration of Gomperz as given in his edition; and it is evident that the latter part of the extract is very doubtful, and that both the name of Sophocles and what he said rest upon an uncertain conjecture. Wilamowitz (Anal. Eur. p. 161) also reads <Σοφοκ> [Ἀ]ῖς δ' ἐν Μυ<σείοις> above. This is the more vexing, as there is no extant passage of Sophocles with a pantheistic import so clearly marked as the fragment of Aeschylus (fr. 70), or Eur. fr. 877 ἀλλ' αἰθήρ τίκτει σε, κόρα, | Ζεὺς δὲ ἀνθρώποις ὀνομάζεται, fr. 941 ὅρῳ τὸν ὕψου τὸνδ' ἀπειρον αἰθέρα | ... τοῦτον νόμιζε Ζῆνα, τὸνδ' ἡγοῦ θεόν: cf. frs. 839, 911. The lines of Aeschylus are preserved by Clement of Alexandria: Ζεὺς ἐστὶν αἰθήρ, Ζεὺς δὲ γῆ, Ζεὺς δ' οὐρανός, |

Ζεὺς τοι τὰ πάντα χῶτι τῶνδ' ὑπέρτερον; and the evidence of Philodemus has effectually silenced the doubts of those who thought that Clement was handing down a false tradition. It has now been shown that the pantheism of Aeschylus is due to Orphic influences, and that such a doctrine flourished in Orphic circles in the sixth century or even earlier: see Gomperz, Greek Thinkers, I p. 97 E. tr. Perhaps then the hinted identification of ἡλιωπὸς οὐρανός and ἡλιωπὸς Ζεὺς is less remarkable in Sophocles than it appears at first sight.

For the connexion of Helios with Zeus see on fr. 752.—ἡλιωπὸς does not occur elsewhere, but belongs to a class of adjectives (κοιλωπός, εὐρωπός, νυκτερωπός etc.) which is common in tragedy. In many cases the second member of the compound had so weakened that it became a mere suffix, as has been shown by Sturtevant in Class. Phil. VII 428 ff. In ἡλιωπός, however, the meaning 'appearance' can still be recognized (ibid. p. 422).

27

ἄρρυθμων

27 Hesych. I p. 293 ἀρύθμων· ἀσυνφώνων. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰγίσθω (so Musurus corrected the MS, which gives αἰγίσθω: Dindorf conjectured Αἰγεί or Αἰθιοψί, Bergk Αἰθωνί).

ἄρρυθμος may be either without rhythm as in Arist. rhét. 3. 8. 1408^b 24, where it is contrasted with ἑμμετρος having the rhythm of verse, and is said to be unlimited (ἀπέραντον); or else having bad rhythm, discordant, as when it is contrasted with τὸ εὐρυθμον (Plat. rep. 400 D). It was employed in the latter sense by Sophocles, and so metaphorically by Eur. Hipp. 529 μήτ' ἄρρυθμος ἔλθοις (of Aphrodite).

ΑΙΘΙΟΠΕΣ

Heyne conjectured that this title should be identified with the Memnon which is mentioned with other Trojan plays in the Argument to the Ajax (p. 3 J.). He is followed by Welcker (p. 136), and is probably right, although anything in the nature of proof is of course impossible. The outline of the plot may in that case be gathered from Proclus chrestom. (Αἰθιοπίς, EGF p. 33) Μένων δὲ ὁ Ἡοῦς υἱὸς ἔχων ἡφαιστότευκτον πανοπλίαν παραγίνεται τοῖς Τρωσὶ βοηθήσων· καὶ Θέτις τῷ παιδὶ τὰ κατὰ τὸν Μένωνα προδίδει. καὶ συμβολῆς γενομένης Ἀντίλοχος ὑπὸ Μένωνος ἀναιρεῖται, ἔπειτα Ἀχιλλεὺς Μένωνα κτείνει· καὶ τούτῳ μὲν Ἡὸς παρὰ Διὸς αἰτησαμένη ἀθανασίαν δίδωσι. Aeschylus also wrote a play entitled Memnon (TGF p. 41), and made the death of Memnon the subject of his Ψυχοστασία.

Wagner thought that Strabo 728 made a slip in quoting Aeschylus (fr. 405) as his authority for the statement that Memnon's mother was a Cissian woman, and that it ought to have been attributed to Sophocles.

28

τοιαῦτά τοί σοι πρὸς χάριν τε κοῦ βία λέγω· σὺ δ' αὐτὸς ὥσπερ οἱ σοφοὶ τὰ μὲν δίκαί· ἐπαίνει, τοῦ δὲ κερδαίνειν ἔχου.

28 Athen. 122 C εἴροι τις ἀνὸ τῶν ἄλλων ποιητῶν ἢ καὶ σοφιστῶν ἐν ἡ δὲ δύο γοῶν ποικίλως εἰρημένα, ὅσα παρὰ... Σοφοκλεῖ τὸ ἐν Αἰθιοπίῳ εἰρημένον 'τοιαῦτα... ἔχου.' V. 2 f. σὺ δ' αὐτὸς... ἔχου are also quoted by Eustath. II. p. 752, 31, who drew from the epitome of Athenaeus.

1 τοί is attached to the pronoun with determinative force: see Jebb on Ai. 776 f., Kuehner-Gerth, § 506. 6.—πρὸς χάριν κτέ., 'to persuade and not to compel.' Cf. O.T. 1152 σὺ πρὸς χάριν μὲν οὐκ ἐρεῖς, κλαίων δ' ἐρεῖς, where it is the person to be addressed who hints at the use of force. Phil. 593 διώμοτοι πλέουσιν ἢ μὴν ἢ λόγῳ | πείσαντες ἄξειν, ἢ πρὸς ἰσχύος κράτος. Eur. Supp. 385 Θησεύς σ' ἀπαιτεῖ πρὸς χάριν θάψαι νεκρούς. Dem. 8. 1 ἔδει... τοὺς λέγοντας ἅπαντας μὴτε πρὸς ἐχθρὸν ποιέσθαι λόγον μὴδένα μὴτε πρὸς χάριν. For the emphatic tautology cf. O.C. 635 βία τε κοῦχ ἐκὼν. Eur. Helid. 885 οὐ μὴν ἐκόντα γ' αὐτόν, ἀλλὰ πρὸς βίαν | ἔξευξ' ἀνάγκη. In Eur. I. A. 360 ἐκὼν, οὐ βία the purpose is not merely rhetorical, but to anticipate an objection, as μὴ τοῦτο λέξης shows. Herwerden (Eur. Helid. p. 101) thought that Sophocles must have written πρὸς χάριν τε κοῦ βίαν as 'longe concinnius.' This is an odd judgment: for such variations are of the essence of Greek style.

2 ε. σοφοί. This appears to be a reference to contemporary Sophistic: for its influence on Sophocles see Nestle in Class. Phil. v. 154. Athenaeus also refers to El. 61, and quotes from Theodorus τὸ κελεύειν μὲν πλέον ἔχειν, ἐπαίνειν δὲ τὸ ἴσον. Eteocles expresses a similar sentiment in Eur. Phoen. 509, where see n. H. quotes Tr. fr. adesp. 4 τοῦ μὲν δικαίου τὴν δίκην ἀρνυσο, | τὰ δ' ἔργα τοῦ πάνθ' ὄντος ἐνθά κερδανεύς, and thinks that our passage may belong to Odysseus, of whom Antisth. Ai. 5 makes Ajax say ὁ δὲ κἄν κρεμνόμενος εἴ γε κερδαίνειν τι μέλλοι. See also on fr. 354. 4.—For τὰ μὲν similarly placed at the end of a line cf. O.T. 1237 τὰ μὲν | ἀλγιστ', and for the same licence in the use of the article and καὶ see Jebb's nn. on Ant. 409, Phil. 312.—ἐπαίνει implies what we express by 'to damn with faint praise': so Hes. Op. 643 νῆ' ὀλίγην αἰνεῖν, μεγάλην δ' ἐνὶ φαρτρία θέσθαι. Cf. Juv. 1. 74 probitas laudatur et alget. The combination ἀρετὴν ἐπαίνειν was so familiar that the Stoics made praiseworthiness an inseparable quality of virtue (Stob. eccl. II. p. 100, 20, Plut. Sto. rep. 13 p. 1039 A, comm. not. 6 p. 1061 A), and Chrysippus employed it as an axiom to deduce therefrom the existence of fate (Alex. Aphr. de fat. 37 p. 210 Br.).

29

τετράπτεροι γὰρ νῶτον ἐν δεσμώμασιν
σφήκοι κελαινόρινες

29. 2 κελαινόρινες Phot., Etym. M. cod. D: μελαινόρινες vulgo ap. Etym. M. editur

29 Phot. lex. p. 22, 15 ἐσφηκωμένον· ἐσφιγμένον, ἀπὸ τῶν σφήκων, οἱ κατὰ μέσον ἐσφιγμένοι· ζυθεν καὶ ὁ σφήν· Σοφοκλῆς Αἰθίοψι τοὺς ἐσφιγμένους μύρμηκας τῇ σαρκώσει· 'τετράπτεροι... κελαινόρινες.' The same words are found in Etym. M. p. 385, 3, but without the name of the play. Hesych. IV p. 114 σφήκοι gives the explanation οὐ κεχυμένοι τῇ σαρκώσει, ἀλλὰ συνεσφιγμένοι. Hence Naber, in his edition of Photius, proposed to restore Σοφοκλῆς Αἰθίοψι <σφηκοὺς καλεῖ> τοὺς ἐσφιγμένους μύρμηκας <καὶ οὐ κεχυμένους> τῇ σαρκώσει, and ingeniously conjectured that the words formed part of an allusion to the giant Indian 'ants' described by Herodotus 3. 102—105, as being smaller than dogs but larger than foxes, resembling the Greek ant in form, and pursuing with exceeding swiftness the Indians who come to gather the gold-bearing sand. These animals, he thinks, were mentioned in a description of Mesopotamia, the home of Memnon, to which belonged the epithet ὀρθόπτερος (fr. 33). Nauck, who accepts Naber's view, would prefer to alter καὶ ὁ σφήν in Photius to καλεῖ σφήκοις. Lobeck (Phryn. p. 674) took an entirely different view of the meaning; and found a clue to it in the fact that a cestus with metal studs was called μύρμηξ. R. Holland in Roscher II 2656 sees in μύρμηκας an allusion to the Myrmidons.

In the absence of the context it is best to connect ἐν δεσμώμασιν with σφήκοι, 'pinched with strapping'; cf. Nonn. Dion. I. 192 δέσμιον Ἀνδρομέδην ἐτέρω σφηκώσατο δεσμῷ. Poll. 2. 25 οὐκ ἐσφηκωμένην, οὐκ ἐνδετον. A.P. 16. 195 καὶ τὰς ὠκυβόλους περιηγέας ἐσφήκωσε | χεῖρας, ὑπὸ στιβαρῷ κίονι δεσάμενος; σφήκος appears to be an adjective with the sense of σφηκώδης: Ar. Plut. 561 ἰσχυροὶ καὶ σφηκώδεις καὶ τοῖς ἐχθροῖς ἀνιαιροὶ is well illustrated by Heliod. 10. 31, where a wrestler is described as ὅλον τὸ σῶμα σφηκώσας, 'with all his body braced.' Cf. fr. 341. Blaydes suggests σφηκτοὶ or σφικτοὶ. The tragic τετράπτερος is parodied in Ar. Ach. 1082 Γηρύνη τετραπτήλω (see on fr. 1127), which refers to a locust.

For allusions in Soph. to Herodotus see Jebb on O.C. 337.

Dindorf restored κελαινόρινες, but no rule can be laid down for these cases: see e.g. Aesch. fr. 300, 2 Νεῖλος ἐπτάρονος. The epigraphic evidence is also fluctuating: Meisterhans¹, p. 95.

30

ἄναρκτον

30 Hesych. I p. 181 ἄναρκτον· ἀνυπότακτον, <οὐ> οὐδεὶς ἤξε (ἤρξει cod. ἄν ἄρξει conj. Blaydes). Σοφοκλῆς Αἰθίοψι. οὐ was added by Musurus.

ἄναρκτον is given by M in Aesch. Eum. 529, where most editors substitute ἀνάρχετον (Wieseler) for metrical reasons.

31

ἀνθοβοσκόν

31 Hesych. I p. 203 ἀνθοβοσκόν (cod. ἀνθοβοσκόν· ἀνθοτρόφον (qu. ἀνθότροφον). Σοφοκλῆς Αἰθίοψι. L. and S. render nourishing, growing flowers; but, apart from authority, I should have thought that the word must mean flower-fed, unless it can be shown that βόσκειν ἄνθη was applied to a gardener. But, as an epithet of the bee, the compound agrees with the normal usage of βόσκω, for which see Neil on Ar. Eq. 255, inf. fr. 140. It is perhaps superfluous to quote Hom. B 89, Eur. Hipp. 77. Ahrens, however, finds a reference to Anthemusia in Mesopotamia, which he supposes to have been the home of Memnon.

32

ἀπιστεῖ

32 Hesych. I p. 242 ἀπιστεῖ· ἀπειθεῖ. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰθίοφι (aithioφ cod.).

ἀπιστεῖν in the sense of to disobey is common in Sophocles: see Ant. 219, 381, 656 etc. Harpocration quotes Antiphon (fr. 21) as using it, and it occurs in Plato

(Stallbaum on Apol. 29c); but is otherwise unknown to Attic prose. For ἀπιστος see on fr. 627. On the other hand πιστεύειν for to obey is rare: Jebb on Trach. 1328.

33

ὀρθόπτερον

33 Phot. lex. p. 346, 19 ὀρθόπτερον· Σοφοκλῆς Αἰθίοφιν· ὀρθοὺς ἔχοντα κολωνοὺς· τὰ γὰρ εἰς ὄψος ἀνέχοντα πτερὰ ἔλεγον· καὶ τὰ περιστάτω. Hesych. III p. 219 explains the word but does not refer to Sophocles as using it: ὀρθόπτερος· μεγάλους κολωνοὺς (μεγαλῶ. ους cod.) ἔχουσα· πτερὰ γὰρ τὰ εἰς ὄψος ἀνέχοντα. ἡ μεγάλας ἔχουσα περιστώφους (πσταοὺς cod., περιστώφους Blaydes) οἰκοδομάς.

The corrupt text of Hesych. was formerly restored as μεγάλους ὤμους ἔχουσα, and Ellendt mentions without approving it a proposal to substitute ὤμους for κολωνοὺς in Phot., thus giving to the adjective a meaning similar to that of εὐρύστερνος. But there can be little doubt that ὀρθόπτερος was used by Soph. in reference to a place or building. (1) In the latter case the meaning is easy: ὀ. would be like περίπτερος an epithet of ναὺς, signifying flanked with columns. The word περίπτερος occurs several times in Athen. 205 A—E, and was interpreted by Casaubon with the help of Vitruv. 3. 3. 6, describing eustyliratio. πτερὸν is properly applied to the projection of the ceiling of the colonnade which stretches out from the cella on either side and rests upon the pillars; it thus follows the analogy of the name deṓs, as given to the gable: Guhl and Koner, p. 21. Cf. Ant. 285 ἀμφικύβας ναοὺς, with Jebb's n. (2) But the lexicographers appear to assert that Sophocles gave to ὀρθόπτερον the meaning, 'with lofty hills.' It is impossible to say what justification, if any, they had for making this statement.

ΑΙΧΜΑΛΩΤΙΔΕΣ

Welcker's treatment of this play (pp. 171—176) is fanciful and unconvincing. From fr. 35 as compared with Eur. Trö. 1136 he concludes that the death of Astyanax was the central incident of the action. Next he infers that the Astyanax of Accius (Ribbeck, Röm. Trag. 412 ff.) was copied from Sophocles, because the remaining fragments do not show any point of contact with the Troades and no other model suggests itself. Accius also wrote a Troades, which Welcker thinks was copied from Aeschylus. All this is uncertain in the extreme, and, even if our play was one of Accius' sources, we know too little of his methods to be justified—in the absence of any corroboration—in using the fragments of the Astyanax for the reconstruction of the Αἰχμαλωτίδες. The title obviously suggests that the plot was similar to that of the Troades; but the fragments are unfortunately indecisive, and the only certain fact is the statement in the Argument to the Ajax that the play belonged to the Τρωικὴ πραγματεία. There is nothing whatever to support Ahrens's guess that the plot is to be found in Hygin. fab. 109, which deals chiefly with the story of Iliona.

On the other hand, A. Schoell and Bergk¹ conjectured that the play was largely concerned with the demand for the restitution of Chryseis as related in the first book of the Iliad. This view was mainly based on frs. 40 and 43; but Hartung, who accepted it, unwarrantably assumed that Chryses was an alternative title for the same play on the ground that frs. 38 and 730 should be identified.

Brunck strangely thought that the Αἰχμαλωτίδες was a satyr-play. The reason which moved him is no longer applicable, since it is now admitted that the line which Harpocration appears to attribute to Sophocles (fr. 34) is actually a fragment from a comic poet.

More recently O. Rizzo² endeavoured to reconstruct the play, with the help of a sepulchral relief discovered near the Porta Salaria at Rome, and of the fragments of Accius. He concludes that Odysseus was the chief character on the Greek side, and that he announced to Andromache the impending execution of Astyanax. The latter was not a child, as in Euripides, but a full-grown youth.

34

στρατοῦ καθαρτῆς κάπομαγμάτων ἴδρις

34 Harpocr. p. 28, 5 ἀπομάττων... Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσι 'στρατοῦ... ἴδρις' καὶ πάλιν 'δαινότατος ἀπομάκτης τε μεγάλων συμφορῶν.' The second extract in Harpocration was printed by the earlier editors as a fragment of Sophocles, but Nauck is almost certainly right in attributing it to a comic poet. The lexicographer's note is attached to Dem. 18. 259 (part of the famous description of Aeschines) καθάιρων τοὺς τελομένους καὶ ἀπομάττων τῷ πηλῷ καὶ τοῖς πεύροις. περιμάττειν and ἀπομάττειν are both technical terms in connexion with ceremonies of lustration and purification. The former, according to the explanation of Wyttienbach (on Plut. de supers. 3 p. 166 A), denotes the smearing of the body with the magic substance, and the latter the wiping off, 'sed utrumque promiscue de tota lustratione dicitur.' Hence both words are sometimes coupled with καθάιρων: cf. Etym. M. p. 573, 1. ἀπομάγματα is strictly the officiarium (τὰ ἀποκαθάρματα Bekk. anecd. p. 431, 31; περιθειώματα Hesych.), and it is unnecessary to follow Campbell in making it equivalent to 'acts or means of purification.' Cf. Menand. fr. 530 III 151 K. (= Phasma 54 p. 205 Körte) περιμαζάτων σ' αἱ γυναῖκες ἐν κύκλῳ, | καὶ περιθεωσάτωσαν. The description would fit an Epimenides.

¹ Alternatively, he argued from schol. Hom. λ 547 that the subject might have been the ὄπλων κρίσις. See Jebb, Ajax, p. xvi.

² Ö. Jh. VIII 824: the article became known to me from Gruppe's summary in Bursians Jahresh. CXXXVII 157.

Hartung, following Schoell's view that the subject of the play is the same as that of the 1st book of the Iliad, thinks that this line is part of an appeal for a prophet who shall be competent to save the army from the plague. Welcker holds that the reference is to Calchas.

35

ἀσπίς μὲν ἡμῇ λίγδος ὥς πυκνομματεῖ

35 ἡμῇ λίγδος Nauck: ἡμίλιγδος codd., ἡμῶν λίγδος Leopardus | πυκνομματεῖ
Bentley: πυκνώματι AB, πυκνὸν πατεῖ C

35 Pollux 10. 189 αὐτὰ δὲ τὸ πῆλινον, δ περιελήφει τὰ πλασθέντα κήρινα, ἃ κατὰ τὴν τοῦ πυρὸς προσφορὰν τήκεται καὶ πολλὰ ἐκείνῳ τρυπήματα ἐναπολείπεται, λίγδος (μίλιγδος codd.) καλεῖται· ὅθεν καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἔφη ἐν Αἰχμαλώτοις 'ἀσπίς...πυκνώ-ματι.' To this passage Hesych. I p. 434 alludes: γλίδου χόαναι· εἰς οὗς τύπους κατέρχεται τὸ ἐν τῇ χώνῃ διὰ τῶν κεντημάτων, ἦσαν δὲ πῆλινοι. Σοφοκλῆς. Cf.
III p. 38 λίγδος· τύπος χόανης, καὶ ἡ θυσία ἐν ἣ χωνεύουσιν. λιγδοῦ χόανη· οἱ δὲ τὰ λίκα τῶν ἀργυρίων.

The speaker describes his shield as riddled with holes, like a λίγδος. No doubt Welcker was right in interpreting this as referring to the holes made by the spears of the enemy and not to eyelet-holes, as L. and S. take it.

Λίγδος is traditionally explained by the lexicographers (Pollux, Hesychius) as the clay mould covering the wax models which were subsequently melted and poured out through holes made for the purpose on the upper surface of the λίγδος. In this way room was left for the molten metal to be poured in. The process (eu cire perdue) is described by Blumner Technologie, IV p. 286. In Phot. lex.

p. 223, 6 λίγδος is not clearly distinguished from the melting-pot or crucible itself:
χώνος τρήματα ἔχων συνεχῇ τέσσαρα (leg.
τῷ δ) παραπλήσια, δι' ὧν ὁ χαλκὸς ῥεῖται.
Both meanings appear in the glosses preserved in Eustath. Od. p. 1926, 52 (Ael.
Dion. fr. 240 Schw.), the last of which agrees with Photius: ἴσως δὲ ἐκ τοιαύτου τινὸς τρόπου καὶ λίγδος παρὰ Αἰλίου Διονυσίου ὁ χώνος, περὶ οὗ ἐν ἐτέρῳ ῥητορικῷ λεξικῷ γράφεται καὶ ὅτι λίγδος χωνεῖα ἀλοιφή.
καὶ λίγδοι· χωνευτήρια, χόανα, νομισμάτων διατύπωσις (? -εις). ἐν ἄλλῳ δέ, ὅτι λίγδος χώνος τρήματα ἔχων συνεχῇ παραπλήσια τῷ δ, δι' ὧν χαλκὸς ῥεῖται. And in the epics it is the χόανον which is said to be bored with holes: Hes. Theog. 862 κασιτερος ὡς | τέχνη ὑπ' αἰγῶν ὑπὸ τ' εὐτρή-του χόανοιο θαλφθεῖς, Apoll. Rhod. 3.
1299 ὡς δ' ὅτ' ἐνὶ τρητοῖσιν ἐύρροιο χόανοισιν | φῶσαι χαλκῶν κτέ.—With πυκνομματεῖν Blaydes compares εἰσωμα-τεῖν, which occurs in Eur. Andr. 765, and εὐλματεῖν in Aesch. fr. 106.

36

ὑφ' ἡρέθῃ σου, κάλαμος ὥσπερ εἰ λύρας

36 σου Poll.: σοι schol. V Ar. (σου ed. Ald., σοῦ, i.e. σοι ὁ, Dind.) | ὥσπερ εἰ Poll.:
ὡς περὶ schol. V Ar., ὥσπερ Ald.

36 Schol. Ar. Kan. 231 κάλαμος πάλα ἀντὶ τοῦ κέρατος ὑπετίθετο τῇ λύρῃ.
καὶ διὰ τοῦτο ἐκ σιγηθείας κάλαμον καλοῦσι
τὸ κέρα, ὡς Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Αἰχμαλώτοις (Αἰχμαλώτοις V) 'ὑφ' ἡρέθῃ...λύρας.' Pollux 4. 62 καὶ δόνακα δὲ τινα ὑπολύριον οἱ κωμικοὶ ὠνόμαζον ὡς πάλα ἀντὶ κεράτων ὑποτιθέμενον ταῖς λύραις· ὅθεν καὶ Σοφοκλῆς εἰρήκεν 'ὑφ' ἡρέθῃ...λύρας.'

There is a trace of the same commentary in Hesych. I p. 519 δόνακα ὑπολύριον· πάλα γὰρ ταῖς λύραις κάλαμος ἀντὶ κέρατος ὑπετίθετο and in Εἰλημ. II.
p. 283, 8. Eustath. Il. p. 1165, 26 expressly ascribes it to Aelius Dionysius (fr. 133 Schw.), the Atticist who lived in the time of Hadrian: Αἴλιος δὲ Διονύσιος εἰπὼν ὡς δόναξ καὶ τὸ ὑπολύριον ἐπάγει· τὸ

γὰρ παλαιὸν ἀντὶ τοῦ κέρατος ὑπετίθεντο κάλαμον. ἐμφαίνει δὲ τοιοῦτόν τι καὶ ὁ κωμικὸς ἐν Βατράχοις, ὑπολῦριον εἰπὼν δόνακα. There can be very little doubt that the note with the quotations goes back to the best days of Alexandrian scholarship, and it would also appear that at that time the mention of δόναξ (or κάλαμος) in connexion with the lyre was an obscure matter. The explanation they adopted was that the bridge over which the strings are stretched so as to keep them from adhering to the sounding-board was a reed instead of being made of horn, as in later days. (This is entirely distinct from the common use of κέρατα = πήχεις for which see on fr. 244.) In other words, κάλαμος was to be understood as the equivalent of μαγάδιον (Lucian dial. deor. 7. 4 καὶ μαγάδιον ὑποθεῖς), and the same interpretation was adopted for Ar. Ran. 233 προσεπιτέρεται δ' ὁ φορμικτὰς Ἀπόλλων | ἔνεκα δόνακος, ὃν ὑπολῦριον | ἐνυδρὸν ἐν λίμναις τρέφω. We are not in a position to say whether the Alexandrian view is correct; but it is not altogether satisfactory, inasmuch as it fails to take account of the description of the primitive lyre given in the Homeric hymn to Hermes (4. 47 ff.), in which there is no mention of a bridge and δόνακος καλῶμοιο occupy an entirely different position, viz.

as fixed in the shell to form a framework over which oxhide was stretched so as to produce a sounding-board. (Allen and Sikes's reference to the passage of Pollux is based on a wrong assumption that κέρατα in his text = πήχεις.) And, in spite of the traditional opinion to the contrary, such may have been the meaning of κάλαμος both in Soph. and in Aristoph. In either case, whether κάλαμος is the bridge or part of the sounding-board, the meaning of our line is clear: 'you are like a lyre which has lost its reed.' Campbell, who reads σοι, renders: 'a reed, as it were, has been abstracted from your lyre,' and thinks that it is appropriate to a chieftain, perhaps Agamemnon, who has had his γέρας taken away. But it seems more likely that the subject to ὑφ' ἡρέθη occurred in the previous line, and I have accordingly placed a comma after σοι. The comparison is with that which, seemingly intact, is yet so maimed as to be deprived of all its virtue. Thus of Cassandra, after the loss of her honour, it might have been said: <καὶ τὸ θεοσίξεν σαφὲς> ὑφ' ἡρέθη... λῦρας. Herwerden, reading σοι, thought that the words referred to a man 'morbo aut senectute aut vitae denique calamitibus pristino vigore privato.' He quoted παρεξηγημένος from Ar. Ach. 682 and the well-known Eg. 513 (of Cratinus).

37

ἐν παντὶ γὰρ τοι σκορπίος φρουρεῖ λίθω.

37 Schol. Nic. Theor. 18 ὑποκάτω τῶν λίθων οἱ σκορπίοι κρύπτονται, ὡς Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν (αἰχμαλώτοις Α) 'ἐν... λίθω.'

This was an old proverb to enforce the warning 'don't trust appearances.' Hence Ar. Theam. 528 τὴν παροιμίαν δ' ἐπαινῶ | τὴν παλαιάν· ὑπὸ λίθω γὰρ | παντὶ που χορὴ μὴ δάκη ῥήτωρ ἀθρεῖν, where the schol. refers to Praxilla (fr. 4) ὑπὸ παντὶ λίθω σκορπίον, ὦ ἑταῖρε, φυλάσσεο. It is amplified in the scholion (23 B.4) quoted by Athen. 695 D ὑπὸ παντὶ λίθω σκορπίος, ὦ ἑταῖρ', ὑποδέχεται. | φράζεο μὴ σε βάλῃ· τῷ δ' ἀφανεῖ πᾶς ἔρεται δόλος. Cf. Aelian nat. an. 15. 26 εἰ γὰρ τοῦτο μὴ γένοιτο (i.e. if the road for the Great King's journey is not thoroughly examined beforehand), ὁ χώρος ἀβατός ἐστιν· ὑπὸ παντὶ γὰρ λίθω καὶ βῶλῳ πάσῃ σκορπίος ἐστὶ. The lexi-cographers and paroemiographers apply it ἐπὶ τῶν κακοήθων: see Phot., Hesych., Suid., Zenob. 6. 20, Diogen. 8. 59. Nauck thinks that in Zenobius the words ταύτης μέμνηται Σοφοκλῆς which are attached to the previous proverb (see on fr. 814) should be transposed to follow this. For the similar saying ἐνα λίθον ἄρας πένθ' ὑπῆσαν σκορπιοὶ see Preller on Polemon fr. 151. It has been well remarked by Weir Smyth (Greek Melic Poets, p. 485) that the Greeks did not expect fair dealing from strangers.

Blaydes would read ὑπὸ παντὶ κτέ., as in the authorities quoted, but the objection to ἐν as the equivalent of 'under' does not appear to be well founded. Cf. Hom. Σ 521 ὅθι σφίσιεν εἰκε λοχῆσαι, ἐν ποταμῷ. Plat. legg. 625 B ἀνάπαντα ἐν τοῖς ὑψηλοῖς δένδρεσιν εἰσι σκιαραί.

38

καὶ βωμιαῖον ἐσχάρας λαβών...

38 Steph. Byz. p. 191, 8 βωμιαῖον...καὶ βωμός ὁ τόπος τῶν θυσιῶν, ὁ πρὸς τὴν ἐσχάραν διάφορος· ὁ μὲν γὰρ οἰκοδομητός, ἡ δὲ σκαπτή. τὸ τοπικὸν βώμιος καὶ κατὰ παραγωγὴν βωμιαῖος. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλώτισσι 'καὶ...λαβών.'

Meineke supplied λίθον as the missing word at the end of the line, but Campbell's suggestion of βάθρον is perhaps better. He remarks that the words may have applied to a suppliant taking refuge at the altar, and might have quoted Eur. I. T. 962 ἐγὼ μὲν θάτερον λαβὼν βάθρον, —of Orestes on his trial before the Areopagus. Vater on Rhes. 913 proposed ἐς χεῖρας λαβὼν θεόν. βωμιαῖος does not appear to occur elsewhere. The distinction made by Stephanus between βωμός and ἐσχάρα is supported by other ancient authorities such as Phot. lex. p. 23, 3 ἐσχάρα· ἡ ἐπὶ γῆς ἐστία στοργυλοειδής...ὁ δὲ βωμός τὸ ἐν ὕψει ἐστὶ πρὸς θυσίαν οἰκοδόμημα, and schol. Eur. Phoen. 274 ἐστία...ὁ ἐπὶ γῆς βάθρος, ἐνθα ἐναγίζουσι τοῖς κάτω ἐρχομένοις. The usage of both words fluctuates: ἐσχάρα is generally the more specific, meaning (1) a sacrificial hearth level with the ground, (2) a movable brazier, (3) a hollow on the upper surface of the altar; but just as βωμός is sometimes employed in the two former of these senses, so ἐσχάρα takes the place of βωμός frequently in verse (cf. fr. 730) and occasionally in prose and inscriptions. Here of course the explanation of Stephanus has no reference to the text of Sophocles, for ἐσχάρας appears to be a possessive genitive, and βωμιαῖον relates to the structure: 'the raised (pedestal) of the altar.' Similarly in Eur. Phoen. 274 (n.) βώμιοι ἐσχάραι are 'the structured altars'; but in Andr. 1138 βωμοῦ κενώσας δέξιμῃον ἐσχάραν the meaning is rather 'the sacrificial slab of the altar (mound),' for it is impossible to say whether the form or the character of βωμός is the more prominent. For further information see Reisch in Pauly-Wissowa vi 614 ff.

39

καὶ νησιώτας καὶ μακρὰς Εὐρωπίας

39 Steph. Byz. p. 287, 10 Εὐρώπη, ἡ χώρα...λέγεται καὶ Εὐρώπεια καὶ διὰ τοῦ ἵ Εὐρωπία παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ Αἰχμαλώτισσι 'καὶ Εὐρωπίας.'

Stephanus quotes also Eur. fr. 38r σχεδὸν παρ' αὐτοῖς κρασπέδοις Εὐρωπίας.

For μακρὰς Brunck conjectured μακρὰν, Ellendt μακρὰς, Bergk καὶ μακρὰς: Campbell, however, remarks that the succeeding words may have been οἰκούντας ἀκτὰς or the like.

40

ταύτην ἐγώ, Κίλλαν τε καὶ Χρύσην...

40 Steph. Byz. p. 697, 1 Χρύση, βαρυνότως, ἡ πόλις τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος ἐγγὺς Ἀθήνων. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀημνίας (fr. 384)...καὶ ἐν Αἰχμαλώτισσι 'ταύτην...Χρύσην.'

Cilla and Chrysa were both places in the Troad where Apollo had sanctuaries: Hom. A 378 Χρύση ἀμφιβέβηκας | Κίλλαν τε ζαθέην Τενέδοιο τε ἱφί ἀνάσσει. Their position in the neighbourhood of the gulf of Adramyttium is described by Strabo 612; he also states that the older town of Chrysa was destroyed, and that the new town, to which the temple of Apollo was transferred, was near Hamaxitus on the slope of Mt Lekton. It should be observed that Stephanus has confused this Chrysa (or Chryse) with the small island of the same name in the neighbourhood of Lemnos, for which see on fr. 384.

Meineke, who observes that the codd. of Stephanus indicate a lacuna after Χρύσην, plausibly suggested that the words were spoken by Apollo, and that νέμω should complete the line. It is, however, extremely awkward to connect ταύτην with the place-names; and I think it is more likely that Hartung was right in placing a comma after ἐγώ, and in making ταύτην refer to one of the captive women. In the latter case a participle such as Hartung's ἐλών would follow Χρόσην; he takes the speaker to be Achilles.

41

εἰ μικρὸς ὢν τὰ φαῦλα νικήσας ἔχω

41 Phot. lex. p. 643, 8 φαῦλον...τεθείη δ' ἂν καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ μεγάλου. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλώτισιν· εἰ...ἔχω. The same words are found as part of what is substantially the same article in Etyim. M. p. 789, 43 and Suid. s.v. φαῦλον. Nauck adis schol. Greg. Naz. in Piccolomini's Studi di filol. gr. I p. 166 and lex. Vindob. p. 187, 8, where the line is quoted without the name of the play.

The statement of the lexicons that φαῦλον = μέγα is incredible, even when supported by the gloss of Hesych. IV p. 234 giving ἄδρον and μέγα among the explanations of φαῦλον. But it does not seem possible to account for the error either by supposing (1) with Campbell, that the words are used ironically, or (2) with Ellendt, that the grammarian who made the quotation was so stupid as to take φαῦλα for the antithesis to μικρός. It is much more likely that the words ἐπὶ τοῦ μεγάλου are the result of a corrupt tradition. In favour of this conclusion it should be observed (1) that in Etyim. M., though not in Phot. and Suid., the catalogue of meanings and examples is introduced by the words φαῦλον σημαίνει δέκα; (2) that the tenfold division is recognized in the abbreviated list without examples given in Bekk. anecd. p. 315, 1 τὸ φαῦλον σημαίνει δέκα, ἐπὶ τε προσώπων καὶ πράγματος τὸ κακόν, τὸ μικρόν καὶ τὸ εὐκαταφρόνητον, καὶ τὸ ἀσθενές, καὶ τὸ ἄδοξον, καὶ τὸ ἀνόητον, καὶ τὸ ἀπλοῦν, καὶ τὸ ταπεινόν· καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ πένητος, καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἐναντίου τῷ σπουδαίῳ, καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ εὐτελοῦς; (3) that the last-quoted list, which contains ten categories but has nothing corresponding to μέγα, agrees generally (though not exactly) with the lists of the three other lexicons, and that all alike go back to a common original Boethus, the author of a Platonic lexicon, according to Naber. From these facts it might be inferred that the μέγα-category was not part of the original note, that the Sophoclean example was probably cited under the category named τὸ ἀσθενές in Bekk. anecd., and that the words ἐπὶ τοῦ μεγάλου are a corruption of ἐπὶ τοῦ ἐναντίου τῷ μεγάλῳ or something of the same kind. But, if it seems incredible that the line of Sophocles was ever seriously quoted to prove that φαῦλον was a synonym of μέγα, some other explanation must be sought for the persistence of the category μέγα in Eustath. II. p. 1356, 64 and schol. Plat. Alcib. II p. 147 D τὸ φαῦλον ἐπὶ τεσσάρων ἐναντιῶν τάσσεται, κατ' ἐναντιότητα παραλαμβάνομένων. ἐπὶ ἀπλότητος καὶ εὐθειας Δημοσθένους (19. 30, cf. 3. 27) οὐ γὰρ εἰ φαῦλοις ὑμεῖς προστάταις χρήσθε· ἐπὶ δὲ τοῦ ἐπαινοῦ Εὐριπίδης (fr. 473). ἐπὶ δὲ μεγέθους, φαῦλον στόμα ἀντὶ τοῦ μέγα. ἐπὶ δὲ μικρότητος κτέ. Stephanus understood φαῦλον στόμα as an ugly mouth; but perhaps φαῦλον was interpreted powerful as being injurious: cf. Eur. Phoen. 94. Anthr. 870.

Ellendt well suggests that the words quoted may have been preceded by μὴ θαυμάζετε, 'don't be surprised that I—who am naught have won a paltry victory.' They are a particular application of proverbial wisdom: cf. Pind. Pyth. 3. 107 μικρὸς ἐν συμκροῖς, μέγας ἐν μεγάλοις ἔσσομαι. So in another connexion τὴν κατὰ σαυτὸν ἔλα.—τὰ φαῦλα is an internal acc. rather than the direct object: cf. Eur. Alc. 1029 τὰ μὲν γὰρ κούφα τοῖς νικῶσιν... τοῖσι δ' αὖ τὰ μείζονα νικῶσι, fr. 1034 τὸ νικᾶν τάνδιχ' ὥς καλὸν γέρας, | τὰ μὴ δίκαια δ' ὥς ἀπανταχοῦ κακόν.—Wecklein (Sitzb. bayr. Ak. 1890 p. 28) proposed to substitute γαῦρα for φαῦλα, but there is no ground whatever for suspecting the text of Sophocles. Blaydes boldly suggested τὰ μέγала.—For the periphrasis with ἔχω see on fr. 489.

42

ἔσπεισα βαιῆς κύλικος ὥστε δεύτερα

42 Schol. Soph. O. T. 750 (cod. Flor. G ed. Dind. p. 42) βαιῆς ἰδίως ἀντὶ τοῦ <εἰς> ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν 'ἔσπεισα...δευτέρα.' Suid. s.v. βαιαί...καὶ βαιῆς ἰδίως ἀντὶ τοῦ εἰς Σοφοκλῆς 'πότερον' κτέ. (O. T. 750) καὶ ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν 'ἔσπεισα...δευτέρα.' Here belongs a badly corrupted gloss of Hesych. 1 p. 353 βαιῶν δλίγον, μικρόν. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ Οἰδίποδι Τυράννῳ ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀφθονος καὶ πολλός. (ἀντὶ τοῦ ἃ ἐπιφέρει γὰρ 'ἢ πολλούς' M. Schmidt) γράμμα Βαιθῆλ οἶκος θεοῦ. βαιῶν ἐκβαλῶν. καὶ ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν βαιῶν, ἐν (βαιῶν) ἐν M. Schmidt).

The words ὥστε δεύτερα are meaningless as they stand and probably, though not certainly, corrupt. Bergk proposed ὥστε δευτέρων with σπονδῶν in the following line (M. Schmidt reports him as proposing δευτέρας), and Bernhardt ὡς τὰ δεύτερα. But Herwerden's elegant εἶτα δευτέρας is much more attractive, if any change is to be made: there must have been such a context as to make the meaning 'one, single' at least a possibility for βαιῆς (e.g. οὐδὲ δεύτερα <παρῶν>).—βαιῆς is used of size as in Phil. 286 βαιῆ τῇδ' ὑπὸ στέγῃ, Aesch. Pers. 451 νῆσος βαιά. Cf. Lycophr. fr. 3 ἐκ βραχέλας δαιτὸς ἢ βαιά κύλιξ.

43

Μύνου τ' Ἐπιστροφίου τε

43 τε Gaisford: γε codd.

43 Schol. A Hom. O 302 τὸ γοῖν Μύνος ὁ μὲν ποιητὴς περιτροσυλλάβως ἐκλινεν...ὁ δὲ Σοφοκλῆς ἰσοσυλλάβως 'Μύνου τ' Ἐπιστροφίου γε.' To the same effect Eustath. Il. p. 1017, 10, who attributes the genitive Μύνου to Sophocles. The name of the play is given by Choerob. in Theodos. p. 140, 5=p. 158, 13 Hilgard Μύνος Μύνου καὶ Μύντος' ὁ μὲν γὰρ Σοφοκλῆς Μύνου ἐκλινεν ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν εἰπὼν 'Μύνου τι Ἐπιστροφίου γε,' ὁ δὲ ποιητὴς ἀναλόγως Μύντος.

Mynes and Epistrophus were brothers, sons of Euenus and grandsons of Selepus. Mynes was king of Lyrnessus and husband of Briseis. Both brothers were slain by Achilles when he sacked the town, and Briseis became the γέρας of the conqueror. The Homeric passages are B 691 Λυρνησὸν διαπορθήσας καὶ τείχεα Θήβης, | καὶ δὲ Μύντ' ἐβαλεν καὶ Ἐπιστροφον ἐγχεσμιώρους, | νείας Εὐήμοιο Σελησιάδαι ἄνακτος, and T 295 (lament of Briseis over Patroclus) δὲ ἄνδρ' ἐμὸν ὥκεις Ἀχιλλεύς | ἐκτείνεν, πέρσεν δὲ πόλιν θείοιο Μύντος. Strabo 612 draws the inference that Lyrnessus was the town of Mynes, since Thebe is excluded as being the stronghold of Eetion. Both were in the south of the Troad on the Adramyttian plain.

44

πατὴρ δὲ χρυσδὺς ἀμφίλινα κρούπαλα

44 Hesych. 1 p. 163 ἀμφίλινα κρούπαλα Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίσι (Αἰχμαλωτίσι cod.). 'πατὴρ...κρούπαλα.'

This obscure and corrupt fragment still awaits elucidation. The attention of critics has been directed chiefly to the correction of the meaningless χρυσδός: Musurus conjectured χρύσε' εἰσδός, leaving the beginning of the line doubtful, Bergk Χρύσει ἀμφιλεγῆναι οἱ Χρυσήϊδος ἀμφίλινα, M. Schmidt πατὴρ λέχρεος δός ('putting on his boots awry!'), and M. Mayer πατὴρ δ' ὑπεκδός (ὑπεκδός Diels). Campbell sought at the same time to set right the prosody of ἀμφίλινα by reading πατὴρ δὲ Χρύσης ἀμφίλινα κράσπεδα, i.e. 'the wool-enwreathed edge of the fillet on his sceptre,' in reference to Hom.

A 14 f. Headlam (J. P. xxx 316), followed by J. M. Edmonds in C. R. xxvii 4, endeavours to defend the long ϵ of ἀμφίλινα by Antiph. fr. 49 11 30 K. (Athen. 453 F) τροφιδίτας τε λινωσάρκους· μανθάρεις; τυρὸν λέγω and other passages, but the evidence is too weak to count against the numerous instances to the contrary. However this may be, it is improbable that Campbell was right in eliminating the reference to some kind of shoe: Hesych. 11 p. 540 has κρούπανα· ξύλινα ὑποδήματα, but κρούπεζαι is the better-supported term (Cratin. fr. 310 1 103 K. οὔτοι δ' εἰσὶν σισυβοῦτοι, κρουπέζο-φόρον γένος ἀνδρῶν). If this be so, it is worth considering the suggestion of M. Mayer that the line refers to Priam, making an attempt to escape from the Greeks. But νεκρὸς will not account for χρυσός, and I cannot help thinking that the corrupt word conceals an allusion to the elaborately fashioned shoes of the oriental monarch with their decoration of gold. So χρυσεοσάνδαλον ἔχρος of Helen and of the Muses in Eur. Or. 1468, I. A. 1042. Pollux 7. 86, 92 mentions σάνδαλα Τυρρηνικά as having wooden soles and gilded straps, and adds that Phidias represented Athena as wearing them. Duris (FHG 11 477) ap. Athen. 535 F, describing the shoe of Demetrius Poliorcetes: τοῦτω δὲ χρυσοῦ πολλὴν ἐνέφανον ποικίλιαν ὀπίσω καὶ ἔμπροσθεν ἐνέντες οἱ τεχνίται. Parrhasius had golden shoe-buckles: Athen. 543 F. ἀμφίλινα would refer to thongs of linen, fastening the shoes round the ankles, and themselves embroidered with gold. The metre might be patched with χρυσᾷ πατῆρ δὲς ἀμφίλινα <τε> κρού-παλα, but the corruption probably lies deeper.

45

ἄχνην Λυδῆς κερκίδος

45 λυδῆς cod.: corr. Musurus

45 Hesych. 1 p. 345 ἄχνην Λυδῆς κερκίδος. Σοφοκλῆς Διχμάλωτοι. ἄχνην τὸ ἄκρον κατὰ τὴν ἐργασίαν ἄκρως ἔχον, ἢ ἀπὸ τῆς θαλασσίας ἄχνης· ἔστι γὰρ λαμπρά καὶ διαφανής. γράφεται δὲ καὶ ἔχνη. M. Schmidt holds that the last words have nothing to do with Sophocles at all, but refer to the place called Ἰχναί in Hdt. 7. 123, of which Steph. Byz. says: Ἰχνη πόλις Μακεδονίας... Ερατοσθένης δὲ ἄλγας αὐτὴν φησι. They do not appear in Proverb. Append. 1. 44 ἄχνην Λυδῆς κερκίδος· τὸ ἄκρον, ἀπὸ τοῦ τὴν ἐργασίαν ἄκρως ἔχειν, ἢ ἀπὸ τῆς θαλασσίας ἄχνης. It is idle to emend ἔχνη (ἔχνη Nauck formerly, ἀκμήν Blaydes).

The most comprehensive gloss on ἄχνη is in Etym. M. p. 181, 50 ἄχνη πᾶσα λεπτότης ὕγρου τε καὶ ξηροῦ. Cf. Suid. s. v. καὶ ἄχνη ἄλδος, τὸ λεπτότατον τοῦ ὕδατος, ὃ ἄφρὸς τῆς θαλάσσης. This will explain its use for teardrops (Trach. 849), for dew (O. C. 681), for spray from the sea (Hom. Δ 426), for smoke (Aesch. fr. 336), and for chaff (Hom. E 499). The colloquial use in Ar. Pers. 92 corresponds: ἦν δ' οἷν καταμύσῃ καν ἄχνη—'even a twink.' Here the reference is to the delicacy or glossiness of the material: 'the fine-sprun product of the Lydian shuttle.' There is no reason to find fault with Hesychius' explanation, but the suggestion that this use of ἄχνη arises by direct transference from the meaning spring is unnecessary. ἄκρως is a common word in the scholia to Sophocles: see schol. O. T. 118, O. C. 1695. Hippocrates used ἄχνη for fluff or shreds of linen, the substance of lint: Erotian p. 50, 12 ἄχνη ὀθονίου· τὸ παρ' ἡμῖν λεγόμενον ξύσμα, ἐξ οὗ γίγνεται μὲν. So ἄχνη λίνου Hesych., Etym. M., Suid., Bekk. anecd. p. 474, 29.

Richness and luxuriousness of dress are often attributed to the Lydians, whose fashions were copied by the Ionians of Asia Minor at the time when Sardis was the capital of Croesus. Cf. Aesch. fr. 59 ὅστις χιτῶνας βασιλέως τε Λυδίας | ἔχει ποδῆρες, Xenophanes fr. 3 ἄβροσύναν δὲ μαθόντες ἀνωφελέας παρὰ Λυδῶν... ἦσαν εἰς ἀγορὴν παναλουργέα φάρε' ἔχοντες. There is a double implication, Lydian ornament as well as Lydian harmony, in Pind. Nem. 8. 15 Λυδίας μίτραν κοναχαδὰ πεποικιλμέναν, although it is not recognized by the editors. Hence Ar. Ich. 112 (Blaydes) etc.—Λυδῆς, here for Λυδίας. So conversely Λυδία for Λυδῆ in Trach. 432.

Welcker interpreted the words as referring to the clothing in which Astyanax was buried: see Introductory Note. Cf. Ἰστριανίδων ὕφη fr. 210, 67.

46

Σαρπηδών ἀκτή

46 Herodian π. μον. λεξ. p. 9, 10 Σαρπηδών Σαρπηδόνας, εἶτε ὁ ἥρω, εἶτε ἡ πέτρα, εἶτε ἡ ἀκτὴ, εἶτε ἡ νῆσος· ὡς παρὰ Σοφοκλεί ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν (cod. -τῆσιν) εἴρηται Σαρπηδών ἀκτὴ.

Other authorities for the Sarpedonian promontory are Hesych. iv p. 12 Σαρπηδών ἀκτὴ· ἀντὶ τοῦ Σαρπηδόνα. τόπος δὲ οὗτος Θράκης ἀπὸ κλύδωνας ἔχων καὶ κυματιζόμενος, ἱερὸν Ποσειδῶνος. The same words occur in Zenob. 5. 86. Phot. lex. p. 502, 3 = Suid. s.v. Σαρπηδών ἀκτὴ· ἀκρὰ τῆς Θράκης· Κράτης τὴν μεγάλην. The last words mean, I suppose, that Crates of Mallus described Sarpedonia as 'the great' promontory. Its position, between the mouth of the Hebrus and the Thracian Chersonese, is fixed by Strabo 331 fr. 52. Cf. Hdt. 7. 58.

Sarpedon is both a personal and a place name, and Sarpedon, the son of Poseidon, who is to be distinguished from his famous namesake, the son of Zeus, was the eponymous hero of the Thracian promontory (schol. Eur. Rhes. 29). He was slain by Heracles on his return from Troy (Apollod. 2. 105). The occurrence of the name in these parts has been connected with other evidence of the settlement of Cretans on the N. coasts of the Aegean (Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 209). Our authorities also mention a rocky island Sarpedon in the Ocean stream, which was the home of the Gorgons: see Cypr. fr. 21 (EGF p. 31). See further on fr. 637.

47

αἰχμέλετος

47 αἰχμῶδενος cod.: corr. Meineke

47 Hesych. i p. 89 αἰχμῶδενος· αἰχμάλωτος. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίσιν (αἰχμαλωτίσιν cod.).

Nauck prefers to read αἰχμέλετος, which is found in Etym. M. p. 41, 3 λέγεται καὶ αἰχμάλωτος καὶ αἰχμέλετος. The word would be well enough (cf. δορικανὴς, δορικανὴς), but could not have been glossed by αἰχμάλωτος; and it is out of place in Etym. M., where it has probably taken the place of αἰχμῶδενος or αἰχμέλετος. I prefer the latter, which is due to Meineke's conjecture: cf. δορίληπτος, δορίκτητος, δορίμάλωτος. If αἰχμῶδενος is right, it is a very unusual compound, since the first member should express an instrument rather than a cause. Ellendt seems to be conscious of this when he renders hasta ligatus, but the meaning required is of course 'bound in war' (L. and S.).

48

ἀλιτρία

48 Hesych. i p. 124 ἀλιτροσύνη· ἀμαρτία. καὶ ἀλιτρία Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίσιν (l. Αἰχμαλωτίσιν) λέγει.

The word is a rare one, and only occurs elsewhere in Ar. Ach. 907 ἀπὸρ πῖθακον ἀλιτρίας πολλὰς πλέων, — a monkey full of mischief. Hence Bekk. anecd. p. 377, 6 (Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 76, 1) and Suid. ἀλιτρία ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀμαρτία Ἀριστοφάνους.

Dindorf proposed to restore ἀλιτρίας in O. C. 371, but, as Jebb remarked, the lengthening of the second syllable would not be permissible. Neil on Ar. Eq. 445 points out that the cognate ἀλιτήριος is a word of grave import, and it may be inferred that in Ach. l.c. ἀλιτρία is mock-heroic (= steeped in sin).

49

ἀνηκές

49 Hesych. I p. 199 ἀνής· ἀήκων. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίσιν. ἀνηκές, which is required by the alphabetical order, was restored by Musurus, and ἀνήκεστον (for ἀήκων) by Pierson on Moer. p. 78, who compares πανακής, and the glosses προσακές and ληθηκές. This is better than M. Schmidt's suggestion ἀνηβές· ἀνηβον. ἀνηκής does not occur elsewhere, but is related to ἄκος as ἀπαθής to πάθος, δυσμενής to μένος, ἀναγής to ἄγος, ἀσθενής to σθένος etc. The long vowel, for which see Monro H. G. § 125 (8), is due to the influence of ἀνήκεστον. Cf. Moeris p. 191, 21 ἀνακές δεινόςως Ἀττικοί, ὡς καὶ Εὐπολὶς Αἰξίν (fr. 21 1 263 K.), ἀθεράπευτον Ἑλληνες.

50

ἀπειθής

50 Hesych. I p. 230 ἀπειθής· ἀνυπότακτος, ἀπιστος (ἀπειστος conj. Nauck: see on fr. 627). Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίσιν (-ώτησιν cod.).

This word is not extant elsewhere in tragedy, though otherwise common enough. Matthiae on Eur. Or. 31 exploded the view that ἀπειθής was the Attic form. Pindar employed ἀπειθής as an epithet of τύχη (fr. 40).

51

ἀρτάνη

51 Bekk. anecd. p. 447, 7 ἀρτάνη κυρίως μὲν ἢ <διὰ> (so Ellendt: ἀπὸ Blaydes) τῶν καλωδίων ἀγχόνῃ, Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν ἐπὶ τοῦ δεσμοῦ. Hesych. I p. 291 ἀρτάνη· ἢ διὰ καλωδίων ἀγχόνῃ, <Σοφοκλῆς δ'> ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν (ἢ αἰχμαλωτίσεις cod.) ἐπὶ τοῦ δεσμοῦ. To these testimonia should be added Etym. M. p. 150, 2 ἀρτάνη· ἢ ἐκ τῶν καλωδίων ἀγχόνῃ, Σοφοκλῆς δὲ <ἐν Αἰχμαλωτίσιν> ἐπὶ δεσμοῦ, ἐν Ἀντιγόνῃ (v. 54) 'πλεκταῖσιν ἀρτάναισιν' ἀγχόναις. The reason for the supplement will appear presently.

ἀρτάνη means a rope, noose, and is always applied by Aesch. and Soph. (it does not occur in Eur.) to a death by hanging. It must not be supposed that in the Αἰχμαλωτίδες Soph. was referring to a rope used for any other purpose, although at first sight such an inference might appear legitimate. For the artificial character of the note can be tested by the scholia. Thus on O. T. 1266 χαλὰ κρεμαστὴν ἀρτάνην we have ἀρτάνην· κυρίως δὲ ἀρτάνη λέγεται ἢ ἐκ τῶν καλωδίων ἀγχόνῃ, but on Ani. 54 πλεκταῖσιν ἀρτάναισι λωβᾶται βίον the comment is ἀρτάναισι ἀγχόναις. The annotator selects arbitrarily one or the other of the fixed synonyms.

52

ἀσεπτον

52 Hesych. I p. 297 ἀσεπτον· ἀσεβές. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίσιν (αἰχμαλωτίσεις cod.). Cf. Bekk. anecd. p. 451, 19 ἀσεπτον· τὸ ἀσεβές.

ἀσεπτος (whence ἀσεπεῖν Ani. 1350) occurs also in O. T. 890 εἰ μὴ τῶν ἀσέπτων ἔρξεται, and in Eur. Hel. 543, Bacch.

890, I. A. 1092. It belongs to the list of verbals in -τος collected on fr. 210, 8 which have an active, or at any rate not a passive force.

Tucker restores ἀσεπτ' for αεπτ' (vulg. ἀεπτ') in Aesch. Suppl. 920 (876).

53

ἐμπλεύρου

53 Hesych. II p. 80 ἐμπλεύρου· ἐνάλλου εἰς (ἐναλούεις cod.) τὰς πλευράς. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμωλυσίων (-ώτησιν cod.).

There is no other trace of the existence of ἐμπλεύρου. The meaning would seem to be 'dash against his ribs,' 'charge him,' if we may judge by the usage of ἐνάλλεσθαι, for which cf. Plut. Lucull. 11 τοῦτο δὴ τὸ λεγόμενον, εἰς τὴν γαστέρα ἐναλλόμενον, non posse suavi. vini se. Epic. 2 εἰς τὴν γαστέρα τοῖς ἀνδράσιν ἔοικας ἐναλίσθαι. Blaydes proposes ἐμπλεύρου, in place of ἐμπλεύρου. At first sight this is plausible, but it appears that ἐμπλεύρου follows the analogy of γναθοῦν (Bekk. anecd. p. 87, 9 γναθοῦ· ἀντὶ τοῦ τὴν γνάθον τύπτει. Φρύγιχος Μονοτρόπῳ. Hesych. I p. 437), κεφαλαιοῦν (Marc. ev. 12. 4), and the Homeric γυνοῦν.

54

ἐνόπαις

54 ἐνώταις cod.; corr. Bentley

54 Hesych. II p. 112 ἐνώταις· ἐνώταις. τῇ προσώδιᾳ ὡς φιλόπαις. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμωλυσίων (-ώτησιν cod.). Elym. M. p. 344, 47 ἐνόπαις· τοῖς ἐνώταις· ἀπὸ τοῦ <ἐν> ταῖς τῶν ὤτων ὀπταῖς κείσθαι Σοφοκλῆς.

ἐνόπαις was restored by Bentley on Hor. Carm. I 9. 7. In place of φιλόπαις Heinsius conjectured διόπαις, a word also meaning earrings and found in Ar. fr. 320, 10 (I 474 K.). For the wearing of earrings by women in Homeric times see Ξ 182 and Leaf in loc. In the classical period the practice was extremely common, and is attested by a variety of names, such as ἐνώτια (also ἐνώδια on inscr.), πλάστρα, ἐλεκτήρες, and (later) ἐλλόβια. See Iwan Mueller, *Privataltertümer*², p. 111; Dict. Ant. I 1002. For the compounds from ὀπή, 'hole,' see Sturtevant in Class. Phil. VII 422.

55

ἐπιμάσσεται

55 Hesych. II p. 160 ἐπιμάσσεται· ἐπαύζεται ἐπὶ πλεόν, ἀπὸ τοῦ μάσσητος, ὃ ἐστὶ μακροτέρου. οἱ δὲ ἐφάψεται, ψηλαφήσει. ἢ ὅταν οὐ λιμώσσει, ἀλλὰ καὶ προσεπιμάσσεται πλείω. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμωλυσίων (-ώτησιν cod.).

Three interpretations are given, of which the last was emended by Reiske with λιμώξει and προσεπιμασθήσεται. In the absence of context we cannot tell why Sophocles' use of the word was obscure, but Dindorf is justified in his view that the second explanation is alone correct. If that is so, Sophocles adopted the Homeric future of ἐπιμαίωμαι in the same sense which it bears in Δ 190 ἔλκος δ' ἰγὴρ ἐπιμάσσεται ἢ δ' ἐπιθήσει | φάρμακα. L. and S., on the other hand, refer it to ἐπιμάσσω, to knead again; but in A. P. 7. 730 Stadtmueller returns to the MS reading πατήρ | δεξιτερῇ κεφαλῇ ἐπεμάσσεται (ἐπεμάσσαντο Reiske, ἐπιμάσσεται Jacobs), and ἐπιμάσσω should perhaps disappear from the lexicons (ἐπιμάττων is read in schol. Ar. Pac. 14).

Ἰαννα

56 Hesych. II p. 338 Ἰαννα· ἐν μὲν Αἰχμαλωτίσι (ὠτήσι cod.) Σοφοκλέους ἀπέδοσαν Ἑλληνική, ἐπεὶ (ἐπὶ cod.) Ἰαννας τοὺς Ἑλληνας λέγουσιν· ἐν δὲ Τριπτολέμῳ (fr. 617) ἐπὶ γυναικός, ὡς καὶ ἐν Ποιμέσι (fr. 519). τινὲς δὲ τὴν Ἑλένην, ἐπεικῶς δὲ οἱ βάρβαροι τοὺς Ἑλληνας Ἰωνας λέγουσιν (λέγουσι μὲν cod.), καὶ ἐν Τρωίῳ (fr. 631) βάρβαρον θρήνημα τὸ ἰαί. ἡ ὄνομα γυναικός.

To orientals who came in contact with them, and especially to the Persians, the Greeks were known as Ἴωνες, Ἰάονες, Ἰάνες. Hence Ar. Ach. 104 οὐ λῆψι χρῆσο, χαυνόπρωκτ' Ἰασαῦ with the schol.: πάντας τοὺς Ἑλληνας Ἰάονας οἱ βάρβαροι ἐκάλουν. Aesch. Pers. 181 Ἰαόνων γῆν οἶχεται πέρσαι θέλων, ib. 952 Ἰάνιον γὰρ ἀπηύρα, Ἰάνων ναύφρακτος Ἄρης, ib. 1014, 1027. There is the same intention in Suhrb. 71 Ἰαονίοισι νόμοισι, where the schol. has rightly ἀντὶ τοῦ φωνῇ Ἑλληνικῇ, but the editors have sought for a more subtle explanation, forgetting that the Danaids are as much foreigners as the Persians. Timoth. Pers. 161 Ἰάονα γλώσσαν ἐξιχνεύων, where the curious broken Greek of the Persian is quoted. The prevalence of the archaic form indicates an attempt to represent the Persian pronunciation: 'in Persian all Greeks were called Yauna' (Starkie on Ach. l. c.). The effeminacy of the Asiatic Ionians prejudiced their kinsmen in Greece against the name: Hdt. I 143 οἱ μὲν ἄλλοι Ἴωνες καὶ οἱ Ἀθηναῖοι ἔφυγον τὸ ὄνομα, οὐ βουλόμενοι Ἴωνες κεκληθῆναι. In the extract from Hesych. it is stated that Sophocles used Ἰαννα (1) as an adj. = Ἑλληνική in the Αἰχμαλωτίδες, (2) as a description of a Greek woman, or specifically of Helen, in the Triptolemus and Poimenes. In place of Ἰαννας it seems almost certain that we ought to read Ἰάνας with L. Dindorf, Lobeck, and others (Ἰάονας Casaubon). Similarly, Lobeck (Path. Prol. p. 32) would give Ἰάνη (or Ἰάννα, as Ellendt prefers) in place of Ἰαννα in the lemma. Blaydes strangely prefers Ἰαννα.

ιερόλας

57 Hesych. II p. 347 ιερόλας· ἰσίους. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλώτοις. ὡς καὶ τὸν γέροντα γεροῦδαν ἢ γεροῦντος λέγει (λέγουσι conj. Blaydes).

For ἰσίους Heringa restored ιερεῖς, and nothing better has been suggested. For γεροῦδαν J. Pearson conjectured γεροῖταν, altering ιερόλας to ιεροίτας accordingly, and this view, so far as concerns γεροῖταν, was approved by Lobeck (Path. Prol. p. 387). On the other hand, Dindorf proposed γερόλαν to correspond with the lemma. ἢ γεροῦντος baffles the critics altogether, and is rejected by M. Schmidt as a marginal gloss. Heringa's ἢ γεροῦντιαν has no probability. It should be added that a few lines before the sis of Hesychius gives ιερόμας· τῶν ἱερῶν ἐπιμελούμενος. Musurus restored ιεροκόμος, but

M. Schmidt combines it with the present gloss thus: ιερόλας· τῶν ἱερῶν ἐπιμελούμενος. ἢ ιερόλας ἰσίους· Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίσι, ds καὶ τὸν γέροντα γερόλαν λέγει. But what is ἰσίους? ιερόλας may be right, but it belongs to a class of words more appropriate to comedy than tragedy, and, if used by Sophocles, was probably contemptuous. The best-known of its cognates are μαινόλης (Sappho), and σκωπτόλης (Ar. Vesp. 788); some are mere vulgarisms, such as ὀξύλης, οἰφύλης, σιφύλης, κορυπτόλης, ἐπιπύλης; κοιόλης, said to mean a priest, is obscure. Lobeck (Phrygichus, p. 613; Path. Prol. p. 129) adds the proper names Μισρόλας, Ἀργόλας, Φειδόλας, Πυθόλας. The formation, though not primitive (Brugmann, Comp. Gr. II p. 211), is not compounded from ἄλλωμι.

58

ἰκτορεύσομεν

58 Hesych. 11 p. 354 ἰκτερεύσομεν· ἰκτεύσομεν. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίς. Is. Voss restored ἰκτορεύσομεν. ibid. p. 352 ἰκτορεύσομεν· ἰκτεύσομεν. This verb is derived from the form ἰκτωρ, which appears also in the compounds ἀφίκτωρ and προσίκτωρ.

59

στερνόμαντις

59 Pollux 2. 161 καὶ στερνόμαντιν Σοφοκλῆς τὸν καλούμενον ἐγγαστρίμυθον. Hesych. 11 p. 107 ἐνστερνομαντίαι· ἐγγαστρίμυθοι. Σοφοκλῆς Αἰχμαλωτίς: no doubt this is rightly corrected by Nauck to στερνομάντιες· ἐγγαστρίμυθοι. Suid. s.v. ἐγγαστρίμυθος. ἐγγαστρίμαντις δὲ νῦν τινες Πύθωνα, Σοφοκλῆς δὲ στερνόμαντιν. Schol. Plat. Soph. 253 C ἐγγαστρίμυθος δὲ ἐστὶν ὁ ἐν γαστρὶ μαντεύμενος. τοῦτον τὸν ἐγγαστρίμαντιν νῦν τινες Πύθωνα φασί, Σοφοκλῆς δὲ στερνόμαντιν. Phot. epist. 64 p. 368 Σοφοκλῆς δὲ... στερνόμαντιν μετωνόμασεν. Considerable notoriety was acquired at Athens during the time of the Peloponnesian war by a ventriloquist named Eurycles, who professed the power of divination by means of a familiar spirit. Hence Aristophanes producing his plays through others compares himself to Eurycles: Eccl. 1019 μιμησάμενος τὴν Εὐρυκλέους μαντείαν καὶ διάνοιαν. | ὥστ' ἀλλοτρίας γαστέρας ἐνδὺς κωμωδικὰ πολλὰ χεῖσθαι. Plat. Soph. 252 C says that the opponents of predication are convicted out of their own mouths: ἐντὸς ὑποφθεγγόμενον ὥσπερ τὸν ἀποπνέον Εὐρυκλέα περιφέροντες αἰεὶ πορεύονται. Cf. Plat. id. or. 9 p. 414 E εὐθεὶς γὰρ ἐστὶ καὶ παιδικὸν κομιδὴ τὸ οἰεσθαι τὸν θεὸν αὐτὸν ὥσπερ τοὺς ἐγγαστρίμυθους, Εὐρυκλέας πάλαι νυνὶ δὲ Πύθωνας προσαγορευομένους, ἐνδυνόμενον εἰς τὰ σώματα τῶν προφητῶν ὑποφθέγγεσθαι, τοῖς ἐκείνων στόμασι καὶ φωναῖς χρώμενον ὄργανοις. Aristid. I 30 Dind., speaking of the inspiration of Dionysus, ἀκριβέστερον Εὐρυκλέους τάνδοθεν καταλαμβάνων, indicates, in the same way as Plutarch, that Eurycles was a generic name given to spirits temporarily occupying the body of a man. There is nothing in these passages which is not satisfied by the simple inference that Eurycles alleged his oracles to be the voice of a demon lodged in his own breast. So schol. Plat.: Εὐρυκλῆς γὰρ ἐδίδκει δαίμονά τινα ἐν τῇ γαστρὶ ἔχειν, τὸν ἐγκελευόμενον αὐτῷ περὶ τῶν μελλόντων λέγειν, and schol. Aristoph.: τῶν ἀληθῶς μαντεύμενος διὰ τοῦ ἐνυπάρχοντος αὐτῷ δαίμονος. Such a proceeding corresponds exactly with the methods of savage magicians, as reported by E. B. Tylor in Enycl. Brit. VII 63: 'cheating sorcerers use ventriloquism of the original kind, which (as its name implies) is supposed to be caused by the voice of a demon inside the body of the speaker, who really himself talks in a feigned human voice, or in squeaking or whistling tones thought suitable to the thin-bodied spirit-visitor.' It is unnecessary therefore to suppose that Eurycles was a ventriloquist in any other sense, or to accept Campbell's inference (on Plat. l.c.) that 'he made his voice sound as if from within the person consulting him.' For further information see Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 9281.

ΑΚΡΙΣΙΟΣ

Jacobs identified this play with the Danae, supposing that it had an alternative title; and Welcker (p. 349) was inclined to agree with him, while reserving the possibility that the same material was used over again by Sophocles for the production of a satyr-play. It should be added that Meineke (on O. C. p. 275) also held that the Danae was a satyr-play, but there is little to justify the assumption¹. Alternative titles are not common and should only be accepted where the evidence is quite clear, as in the case of the Φρύγες or "Ἐκτορος λύτρα" of Aeschylus (TGF p. 84). Besides, it is not likely that a play would be named alternatively after one or other of the principal characters. It would be more natural to suppose that the citation of the play as Danae was a mistake, due to the identity of the subject-matter with that of Euripides' Danae and the greater celebrity of the latter. For similar errors see Introduction, § 1. It must, however, be admitted that the error, if such it was, was more persistent than is usually the case, and had infected even the best critical tradition.

Brunck, on the other hand, considered that the Acrisius must be identified with the Larissaei, and that its subject was the accidental killing of Acrisius by Perseus when throwing the discus. The variation of title would be more natural than in the other case, but Jacobs appears to be justified in arguing that frs. 64 and 65, at any rate, are more suitable to the story of Danae. See also Escher in Pauly-Wissowa IV 2086.

If the identification of the Acrisius with the Danae is correct, it contained the story up to the time of the discovery of the birth of Perseus, when Acrisius sent mother and child adrift on the Aegean in a λάρναξ. Perseus was known to Hesiod as the son of Danae (Scut. 216), and is mentioned as the son of Zeus and Danae in Hom. Ξ 319 f. The fullest and best account of the legend depends on the authority of Pherecydes in schol. Ap. Rhod. 4. 1091, 1515 (FHG I 75). Sophocles refers to the imprisonment of Danae in the brazen chamber in Ant. 944. There may be a reference to our play in Menand. Sam. 244 οὐκ ἀκήκοας λεγόντων, εἰπέ μοι, Νικήρατε, τῶν τραγωδῶν, ὡς γεγόμενος χρυσὸς ὁ Ζεὺς ἐρρῦη | διὰ τέλους, κατειργμένην δὲ παῖδ' ἐμοίχενσέν ποτε;

¹ See n. on fr. 165. Meineke also relied on frs. 166, 167.

60

ὥς ἐπιψάλλειν βίδην τε καὶ ξυναυλίαν

60 ὥστ' conl. Ellendt | ἐπιψάλλ cod.: corr. Musurus | βίδηται cod.: cor. Maussacus

60 Hesych. I p. 375 βίδης· εἶδος. κρούμα. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρ <σιώ>... ὥς... ξυναυλίαν· ἄλλοι βίδην. For the last word, which is otherwise unknown, Nauck conj. βύδην, comparing ibid. p. 405 βυδοί· οἱ μουσικοὶ ἢ κρούμα τι. σοφῶς κρησίν (corrected by Fungius to Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρισίω). Nauck thinks the second passage undoubtedly belongs here, but Dindorf, while admitting this to be possible, prints it also under the title Κρίσις as fr. 332 of his edition. Nauck's view is the more probable.

βίδην, if that is the right reading, evidently puzzled the copyists as is shown by the variants recorded above. If κρούμα is the correct explanation, it means a note played on a musical instrument, strictly on the lyre; and ἐπιψάλλειν shows that the lyre is in question here. But what kind of a note? No answer can be given, and it is idle to enquire whether βίδην, βύδην, βίδον or some other form should be preferred, since they are all equally obscure. βύδην obviously suggests itself, but, although it is sometimes explained by ikanōs (Hesych., Etyim. M.), there is no trustworthy evidence of its usage otherwise than as = confertim. Hartung, who supposes that βύδην was a by-form of βύδην, is certainly not justified in rendering it 'in muffled tones.' ἐπιψάλλειν is probably only a strengthened form of ψάλλειν = 'to play on the lyre,' as in Pollux 4. 58; there is no authority for L. and S.'s translation 'to accompany with the lyre.' Blaydes conjectured

ὥσπερ | ψάλλοι (for ὥς ἐπίπταται | ψάλλειν), with εἶδος κρούματος in the gloss.

ξυναυλίαν has various meanings which are not adequately distinguished in the lexicons. (1) The concerted playing of lyre and flute: Athen. 617 F illustrates this from Ehippus fr. 7 (II 254 K.). So schol. Ar. Eq. 9 ξυναυλία λέγεται ὅταν κιθάρα καὶ αὐλὸς συμφωνῇ, schol. Greg. Naz. II p. 106 λέγομεν δὲ συναυλίαν καὶ κιθάρης ἅμα συγκρουομένης αὐλῷ καὶ συμφθεγγομένης. (2) A symphony of flutes: schol. Ar. I., ξυναυλία καλεῖται ὅταν δύο αὐλῆται τὸ αὐτὸ λέγῃσιν. Hesych. III p. 172 τὴν ὑπὸ δύο ἐπιτελουμένην αὐλῆσιν. Pollux 4. 83 Ἀθήνησι δὲ καὶ συναυλία τις ἐκαλεῖτο· συμφωνία τις αὐτῇ τῶν ἐν Παναθηναίοις συναυλοῦντων. (3) The accompaniment of the voice by the flute, differing from αὐλωδία in this respect, that no articulate words were sung. Such appears to be the meaning of the definition given by Semus ap. Athen. 618 A ἢ τις ἀγὼν συμφωνίας ἀμοιβαίως αὐλοῦ καὶ ῥυθμοῦ χωρὶς λόγου τοῦ προσμελωδούντος. To the same effect but less precisely Pollux 4. 83 οἱ δὲ τὴν συναυλίαν εἶδος προσαυλήσεως οἰοῦνται ὡς τὴν αὐλωδίαν. The best account of the word is to be found in Hemsterhuis on Lucian dial. mar. 3. 2, who proceeds to show that it is often used figuratively to express consent or harmony. So far as it is possible to judge, Soph. appears to have used the word in the first sense. The verse is a trochaic tetrameter with an iambus wanting at the end.

61

XO. βοᾷ τις, ὦ.
ἀκούει; ἡ μάτην ὑλακτῶ;
πάντα γάρ τοι τῷ φοβουμένῳ ψοφεῖ.

61. 3 πάντα SMA: ἅπαντα vulgo

61 Stob. flor. 8. 3 (III p. 340, 13 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀκρίσιος. βοᾷ... ψοφεῖ. Codex S of Stobaeus alone prefixes to the extract the symbol of the Chorus.

The fragment has been assailed by many critics. Thus, Hermann endeavoured to restore two senarii by reading ὑλῶ for ὑλακτῶ; Gaisford, Conington, G. H. Mueller and Naber conjectured οὐκ ἀκούει' and Gomperz εἰσακούει' for ὦ ἀκούει'; and for ἡ μάτην ὑλακτῶ Porson substituted ἡ λάσκω μάτην, Halm ἡ μάτην κλύω, Naber ἡ μάτην καλῶ, Vatter ἡ μάτην

κτυπεῖ, Nauck ἡ μάτην ἀλυκτώ. Wecklein approved the restoration of βοῶ τις· οὐκ ἀκούει· ἡ μάτην κλύω; ἀπαντα κτέ. Hense thinks the original may have run ἀκούει· <ὡ γυναικες>; ἡ μάτην κτέ., and accepts the vulgate ἀπαντα. They quote El. 1406 βοῶ τις ἔνδον· οὐκ ἀκούει·, ὡ φίλοι; The objection taken to μάτην ὑλακτώ appears to be ill-founded, and the connexion is, 'Do ye hear? Or am I but an idle babbler? For in my fear it may be that I hear a sound where there is none.' H., who justifies the text, quotes for μάτην ὑλακτεῖν Aesch. Ag. 1672 ματαίων τῶνδ' ὑλαγμάτων (Clytemnestra of the Chorus). Plat. legg. 967 C τοὺς φιλοσοφοῦντας κυσι ματαίαις ἀπεικάζοντας χρωμέναισι ὑλακαῖς. Tryphiod. 421 (of Cassandra) μάτην ὑλάουσα. Dion Cass. 46. 26 πολλά γοῶν καὶ μάτην ὑλακτεῖς. So μαψυλάκαν in Pind. Nem. 7. 105, and μαψυλάκαν γλώσσαν in Sappho fr. 27. Observe the appropriateness of the metaphor from a dog barking at a sound or shadow by night. 'To fear a sound' was proverbial (note τιν in v. 3) of a nervous or baseless fright: cf. fr. 314, 139. Hence Eur. Phoen. 269 ὦ τίς οὔτος; ἡ κτύπον φοβοῦμεθα; ἀπαντα γὰρ τολμῶσι δεινὰ φαίνεται, which closely resembles the present passage. H. writes: 'Ψοφοδῆς was the title of one of Menander's plays, from which, I suspect, was borrowed a detail in J. P. 11. 210 ἀνθηρα καὶ δάφνην παραβύεται ὁ στρατιώτης | ἄλλος ἀποσφίγγας μήλινα λώματα

(schol. ψοφοδῆς στρατιώτης, μηδὲ ψόφον τῆς δάφνης φέρειν δυνάμενος), "stuffs his ears against the crackling of cinders and of laurel in the fire with the fringe of his military woollen cloak." Cf. Hesych. μενέκτυπος· ὁ μὴ ψοφοδῆς. Eur. Hec. 1113 φόβον παρέσχ' ἂν οὐ μέσως ὁδε κτύπος. Rhes. 563 ΟΔ. Διόμηδης, οὐκ ἤκουσας—ἡ κενὸς ψόφος | στάζει δι' ὧτων;—τευχέων τινὰ κτύπον; ΔΙ. οὐκ, ἀλλὰ δεσμὰ πωλικῶν ἐξ ἀντύγων | κλάζει σιδήρου· κάμει τοι, πρὶν ἡσθῆμιν | δεσμῶν ἀραγμῶν ἱππικῶν, ἔδν φόβος. In Aesch. Theb. 97—100 the panic-stricken maidens are made by the MSS to cry ἀκούει· ἡ οὐκ ἀκούει· ἀσιπίδων κτύπον;...κτύπον δέδοικα· πάταγος οὐχ ἐνὸς δорός, and δέδοικα was accepted by Jebb on O. T. 186, Phil. 215; but we must surely read δέδοικα: cf. 235, 185, Agam. 1535, Soph. O. C. 1462 κτύπος, ἰδε, μάλ' ὅδ' ἐρείπεται | δούβολος ἀφατος (so I read: μέγας is a gloss, as may be seen from Suid. s.v. ἀφατος) ...δέδοικα δ'· οὐ γὰρ ἄλιον...Dr Verrall, comparing Rhes. 784 χειρὶ σὺν κενῇ δорός, conjectures in Theb. 100 πάταγος οὐ κενὸς δорός, which is very probable in my opinion, except that I would rather punctuate κτύπον δέδοικα—πάταγος οὐ κενός—δорός. Similarly in Eur. Suppl. 179 Tyrwhitt corrected δεδοικέαι for δεδοικέαι of the MSS. In an epigram quoted by Meineke Anaf. Alex. p. 397 read τίμα τὸν στέρνοντα, παλαιογραφὰ δ' ἔργα δεδοικώς (for δεδοικώς) | πειράθητι φρονεῖν μηδὲν ὑπὲρ τὸ μέτρον.

62

ἀλλ' οὐδὲν ἔρπει ψεύδος εἰς γῆρας χρόνον.

62 Stob. flor. 12. 2 (III p. 444, 6 Hense) Σοφὸν Ἀκριστὶ (so S, Σοφὸν, Ἀκρί cod. Voss., Ἀλεξάνδρι B: the extract is omitted in MA). ἄλλ'...χρόνον.

The sentiment, that falsehood is a sickly growth which soon decays, may be illustrated by Aesch. Ag. 625 οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως λέξαιμι τὰ ψευδῆ καλὰ | ἐς τὸν πολὺν φίλοισι καρποῦσθαι χρόνον. Arist. eth. N. 1. 8 1098b 11 τῷ μὲν γὰρ ἀληθεῖ πάντα συνάδει τὰ ὑπάρχοντα· τῷ δὲ ψευδεῖ ταχὺ διαφάνει τὰ ληθεῖς. Theophr. fr. 153 W. ἐκ διαβολῆς καὶ φθόρου ψεύδος ἐπ' ὀλίγον ἐκχύσαν ἀπεμαρῶνται. Menand. monost. 517 ψευδόμενος οὐδεὶς λαμβάνει πολὺν χρόνον. Similarly χρόνος δείκνυσιν ἄνδρα (O. T. 614 etc.). Nauck, objecting to the phrase γῆρας χρόνον in this connexion, altered γῆρας to μήκος. This is an arbitrary proceeding, which destroys a characteristic subtlety of diction. Tr.: 'no falsehood lasts through time's decay.' γῆρας χρόνον follows Aesch. Prom. 1013 ἀλλ' ἐκδιδάσκει πάνθ' ὁ γηράσκων χρόνος, Eum. 186 χρόνος καθαιρεῖ πάντα γηράσκων ὁμοῦ. F. W. Schmidt added Tr. fr. adesp. 508 μετὰ τὴν σκιὰν τάχιστα γηράσκει χρόνος, and Lucian amoi. 12 οὐδ' αὐτὰ γέροντος ἤδη χρόνου πολλὰ καθήναιεν. It might be thought that γῆρας should be attributed to ψεύδος, and that χρόνον could be spared. But the omission would suggest the meaning that falsehood is ever young: cf. O. C. 954 θυμὸς γὰρ οὐδὲν γῆρας ἔστιν ἄλλο πλὴν | θανεῖν, Aesch. Theb. 669 οὐκ ἔστι γῆρας τοῦδε τοῦ μῦθοματος. For γηράσκειν as implying decay see Wilamowitz on Eur. Her. 1223.

63

δῆλον γάρ· ἐν δεσμοῖσι δραπέτης ἀνὴρ
κῶλον ποδισθεὶς πᾶν πρὸς ἡδονὴν λέγει.

63 Stob. flor. 62. 30 (IV p. 427, 10 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀκρίσιω. 'δῆλον... λέγει.'

The situation supposed, that of a runaway slave who having been caught says all he can to win favour, is exactly reproduced in Eur. Or. 1498 ff. in the case of Orestes and the Phrygian, who says of himself δραπέτην γὰρ ἐξέκλεπτον ἐκ δόμων πόδα. Orestes taunts him (1514) δειλὰ γλώσση χαρίζη, τάνδον οὐχ οὕτω φρονῶν, and threatens him (1516) ὁμοσον, εἰ δὲ μὴ, κτενῶ σε, μὴ λέγειν ἐμὴν χάριν.

1 I have followed Nauck in putting a colon after δῆλον γάρ: the asyndeton in the explanatory clause is usual, as with δῆλον δέ, σημείον δέ, and the like (Kuehner-Gerth, § 469, 1). Grotius altered δῆλον to δούλον, and was followed by Brunck and Dindorf. H. points out that the order of the words is against taking δῆλον as a grammatical qualification of the clause ἐν...λέγει, as if it were an adverb or a parenthetical adjunct (scil. ἐστίν). He quotes Ai. 906 αὐτὸς πρὸς αὐτοῦ, δῆλον, fr. 585 ἀλγυνά, Πρόκνη, δῆλον. So some take O. C. 321 μόνος τόδ' ἐστὶ δῆλον Ἰσμήνης κάρα. Add Theocr. 10. 13 ἐκ πίθω ἀντλείς δῆλον. But, so used, δῆλον could not stand at the beginning of the sentence.

2 πρὸς ἡδονὴν means the same as πρὸς χάριν (cf. χαριτογλωσσέειν) with which it is interchangeable: see Dem. 4. 38, 51. Cf. El. 931 οὐ πρὸς ἡδονὴν λέγω τάδε; Eur. Med. 773 δεχου δὲ μὴ πρὸς ἡδονὴν λόγους, fr. 28 (n.). Blaydes needlessly conjectured κῶλ' ἐμποδισθεὶς: cf. O. C. 183.

64

ῥῆσις βραχεῖα τοῖς φρονούσι σῶφρονα πρὸς τοὺς τεκόντας καὶ φυτεύσαντας πρέπει, ἄλλως τε καὶ κόρη τε κάργεια γένος,

64. 3 κόρη...κάργεια Meineke: κόρη...καργεία codd.

64 Stob. flor. 79. 24 (IV p. 623, 17 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀκρίσιω. 'ῥῆσις... πρέπει.' Stob. flor. 74. 28 (IV p. 579, 10 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρίσιω. 'ἄλλως...ἐπη.' S omits the latter extract. Meineke joined vv. 1, 2 to vv. 3, 4, the two couplets being separate extracts in Stobaeus; and they fit together so exactly that his conjecture has a high degree of probability.

1 βραχεῖα. F. W. Schmidt, comparing Eur. Phoen. 452 f., needlessly proposed βραδεία; for the verses are more likely to belong to a speech of Danae to Acrisius, than to a rebuke addressed to her by her father.—τοῖς φρονούσι σῶφρονα. For the order of the words cf. O. T. 139, El. 792, Ai. 635, 1252, Ant. 723, with Jebb's notes.

2 τεκόντας καὶ φυτεύσαντας is tautologous, but intended to emphasize the tie of relationship. So El. 12 πρὸς σῆς δμαῖμον καὶ κασιγνήτης, Aesch. Cho. 328 πατέρων τε καὶ τεκόντων, Eur. Her. 1367 ὁ φύσας χῶς τεκὼν ὑμᾶς πατήρ, Suppl. 1092 ὅστις φυτεύσας καὶ τεκὼν νεανίαν, Hec. 414 ὦ μήτηρ, ὦ τεκοῦς'. It is unnecessary to suspect the text, as some critics have done: see Nauck. Mekler conj. τοὺς τεκόντας καὶ λοχεύσαντας, comparing Eur. El. 1129.

3 ἄλλως τε καὶ occurs also in El. 1324 and ἄλλως τε in O. T. 1114. Aeschylus uses ἄλλως τε πάντως καὶ in Eum. 729, Pers. 691, Prom. 662 f. σὸν ἔργον, 'τοῖ, ταῖσδ' ὑπουργήσαι χάριν | ἄλλως τε πάντως καὶ κασιγνήταις πατρός.—κάργεια, βραχυλογία was characteristic of the Dorians, of the Argives as well as the Spartans: cf. Pind. Isth. 5. 58 τὸν Ἀργείων τρόπον | εἰρήσεται πᾶς ἐν βραχίστοις, Aesch. Suppl. 279 μακρὰν γε μὲν δὴ αἶς κόσμος ἡ σιγή τε καὶ τὰ παῦρ' ἔπη.

4 ἡ σιγή τε] σοσίγεται M et primitus A ῥῆσιν οὐ στέργει πόλιν, ib. 206 f., Soph. fr. 462.—γένος: for the acc. of respect see Jebb on Phil. 239.

4 κόσμος: cf. Al. 293 γυναῖξί κόσμον ἡ σιγή φέρε. In this and similar phrases the idea of personal ornament seems to be conveyed (fr. 846); one suspects that σιγή κόσμος, silence a jewel, was almost proverbial: cf. Eur. fr. 219 κόσμος δὲ σιγῇ στέφανος (στεφανὸς Herw.) ἀνδρὸς οὐ κακοῦ, Bacchyl. 3. 94 πράξαντι δ' εὖ οὐ φέρει κόσμον σιωπᾷ.—αἶς. For the plural see on Eur. Hel. 440 and add Plat. rep. 554 A θησαυροποιὸς ἀνὴρ· οὐς κτέ. H., who thinks that the speaker is Acrisius, renders:

Short speech for those of proper modesty
Is seemly toward the parents that beget them;

The more so for a girl and Argive born,
Whose ornament is silence and few words.

65

θάρσει, γύναι· τὰ πολλὰ τῶν δεινῶν, ὄναρ πνεύσαντα νυκτός, ἡμέρας μαλάσσεται.

65 Stob. flor. 108. 56 (IV p. 971, 13 Hense) Σοφοκλέους 'Ακρισίῳ (so MA: S omits the name of the play). 'θάρσει... μαλάσσεται.'

(1) The metaphor is generally taken, as by Ellendt and Campbell, to be that of a gale which blows for a time and then subsides. A simile will be required in English: 'most of the terrors that come in dreams are like a wind that blows by night and sinks in the day-time.' Thus πνεῖν used metaphorically would connote a certain degree of vigour or violence as in Ar. Eq. 437 οὗτος ἦδη κακίας ἢ συκοφαντίας πνεῖ, and would be contrasted with μαλάσσεται. Phot. lex. p. 321, 23 πνεύσας· σφοδρῶς ὀργισθεῖς. Suid. s.v. Hesych. III p. 348 πνεύσας· ὀργισθεῖς, ἀπὸ μεταφορᾶς τῶν ἀνέμων. (2) But the association of πνεῖν with dreams in El. 480 ἀδυνάων κλύουσαν | ἀρτίως ὀνειράτων and in Aesch. Cho. 33 τορὸς γὰρ ὀρθόθριξ φόβος | δόμων ὀνειρόμαντις ἐξ ὕπνου

κότον | πνέων ἀωρόνυκτον ἀμβάμα, where the language has several points of similarity, makes this explanation doubtful. Kaibel (on El. l.c.) suggests that the metaphor is taken from the breath of the voice: a dream is a message heard. It should be added that μαλάσσεται is not an apt word in relation to a gale; its usual application is rather to express the assuagement of an emotion. Anyhow, there is no occasion for Blaydes's φανέντα (for πνεύσαντα).—The daylight was believed to be effective in purging the evil influence of dreams: Eur. I. T. 42 ἀ καὶ δ' ἤκει νύξ φέρουσα φάσματα, | λέγω πρὸς αἰθέρ', εἴ τι δὴ τόδ' ἔστ' ἄκος.

Ribbeck, Röm. Trag., p. 55, refers this fragment to a significant dream of Danae or her mother, and compares Naevius Danae fr. v amnis nivo fonte lavere me mentini nupum, where he finds an allusion to a dream.

66

τοῦ ζῆν γὰρ οὐδεὶς ὥς ὁ γηράσκων ἐρᾷ.

66 Stob. flor. 119. 7 (IV p. 1076, 3 Hense) τοῦ αὐτοῦ (sc. Σοφοκλέους) 'Ακρισίῳ. 'τοῦ...ἐρᾷ.' In Stob. flor. 115. 9 (IV p. 1022, 8 Hense) the line is attached to a passage from a comic poet (Antiphanes fr. 238 II 116 K.), and appears again in Stob. flor. 116. 39 (IV p. 1046, 7 Hense) Σοφοκλέους. 'ζῆν...ἐρᾷ.'

For the sentiment see on fr. 298.—οὐδεὶς ὥς, 'none so much as,' is like οὐδὲν οἶον, for which see on fr. 556. The converse ὥς οὐδεὶς, 'more than any,' occurs in Plat. apol. 35 v. Cf. Eur. fr. 320 οὐκ ἔστιν...δυσφύλακτον οὐδὲν ὥς γυνή. Aesch. Cho. 848 οὐδὲν ἀγγέλων σθένος | ὥς αὐτός.

67

τὸ ζῆν γάρ, ὦ παῖ, παντὸς ἥδιον γέρας·
θανεῖν γὰρ οὐκ ἔξεστι τοῖς αὐτοῖσι δῖς.

67. 1 ἥδιον Meineke: ἥδιον codd.

67 Stob. flor. 119. 12 (IV p. 1074, 12 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀκρισίου (so A: om. S). 'τὸ ζῆν...δῖς.'

No man can die twice; and that makes life all the sweeter, as an experience that can never be repeated. The second line is a variation of the saw often remodelled after Hom. I 408 ἀνδρὸς δὲ ψυχὴ πάλιν ἐλθεῖν οὔτε ληϊστή | οὔθ' ἐλετή, ἐπεὶ ἄρ' κεν ἀμείψῃ ἔρκος ὀδόντων. Cf. Aesch. Eum. 651 ἀπαξ θανόντος οὕτως ἐστ' ἀνάστασις. Eur. Her. 297. Alc. 1076. Suppl. 775 etc.

1 ἥδιον. I have accepted Meineke's correction: for the common confusion of comparative and superlative terminations see Cobet, N. L. p. 119. παντὸς ἥδιον cannot be defended either by the anomalies, mostly corrupt, collected in Kuehner-Gerth I 22 f., or by παντὸς μάλιστα quoted by Stephanus from Dion. Hal. ant. Rom. I. 24, 2. 75, 3. 35 and other passages, where it takes the place of the Platonic παντὸς μᾶλλον. Blaydes preferred πᾶσιν (or πον'σιν) ἥδιον.

68

Ἀκτίτης λίθος

68 Hesych. I p. 110 ἀκτίτης (ἀκτῆτις cod.: corr. Musurus) λίθος· ἀπὸ τῆς ἐν Πελοποννήσῳ ἀκτῆς. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρισῖω. Cf. Harpocr. p. 10. 4 Ἀκτὴ ἐπιβαλαττιδῖος τις μοῖρα τῆς Ἀττικῆς· Ὑπερίδης ἐν τῷ περὶ τοῦ ταρίχους· ὅθεν καὶ ὁ ἀκτίτης λίθος. To the same effect, but without the reference to Hyperides, Bekk. anecd. p. 370, 9, Suid. s.v.

Ἀκτίτης λίθος was the name given to the limestone taken from the quarries worked at Acte, the peninsula to the S. of the Peiraeus and lying between it and the bay of Phalerum. Cf. Cl. I. II 1054, 16 οἰκοδομῆσαι δὲ τοῖς τοίχοις τῆς σκευοθήκης καὶ τοῖς κίονας Ἀκτίτου λίθου. See Dittenberger's note (Syll. 537, 17). Hesych. I p. 108 explains ἀκταία, supposed to be a kind of mortar, as ἡ ἐκ τοῦ Ἀκτίτου λίθου κατασκευασθεῖσα, τοῦ Πεντελικοῦ (? Πειραικοῦ). In Tr. fr. adesp. 467 from Steph. Byz. p. 64, 15 Ἀκτίτης, ἐξ οὗ τὸ 'Ἀκτίτου πέτρα' ἐν τῇ τραγωδίᾳ ἀντὶ τοῦ Ἀττικοῦ Nauck is probably right in restoring Ἀκτίτις πέτρα. The scene of the Acristus was laid at Argos, and this fact confirms the statement of Hesychius that Sophocles referred to the Peloponnesian Acte; for this was also the name given to the east coast of Argolis between Troezen and Epidaurus. The alternative is to suppose that he was alluding to stone imported from Attica, and that Hesych. is mistaken. For the form ἀκτίτης, which would properly be applied to an inhabitant of Acte, see on fr. 92.

69

Μαριεύς ἀλοιμός

69 Etyim. M. p. 69, 42 ἀλοιμός· τὰς χρίσεις καὶ τὰς ἐπαλείψεις ἀλοιμοῖς ἔλεγον. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρισῖω· ἡ ἐπάνω τῆς τοῦ θαλάμου γανώσεως ἐνείεσσα ἐπάλειψις, καθάπερ αἱ πετάλωσις οὐσα ἐν αὐτῷ. The information is attributed to Orus, a grammarian of uncertain date (Sandys, Hist. Cl. Scholarship I p. 325). Hesych. I p. 130 ἀλοιμός (ἀλοιμα cod.)· χρίσμα τοίχων. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρισῖω. Bekk. anecd. p. 385, 9 ἀλοιμός· τὸ τῶν τοίχων χρίσμα.

The reference is to a method of wall-decoration by a process of polishing or varnishing, which was connected with the name of the Cyprian town of Marion, afterwards known as Arsinoe. It was situated on the N. coast of the island between the promontory Acamas and the town of Soli (Strabo 683). The site is described by Munro and Tubbs in J. H. S. xi 1 ff. Orus explained the process by comparing it to πετάλωσις, i.e. the laying-on of gold-leaf. See Plato's description of the walls of Atlantis: Criti. 116 B και τοῦ μὲν περὶ τὸν ἐξωτάτω τροχὸν τείχους χαλκῷ περιελάμβανον πάντα τὸν περίδρομον, οἷον ἄλοι φῆ προσχρώμενοι: ibid. D πάντα δὲ ἐξωθεν περιήλειψαν τὸν νεὺν ἀργύρῳ κτέ. No doubt such ornamentation was associated by the Greeks with the art of the heroic age, rightly enough as recent discoveries have proved: see Jebb, Introduction to Homer, p. 61. [Arist.] mir. ausc. 41 mentions a stone called μαριεύς, which takes fire when water is poured on it. But in Hesych. iii p. 72 this is named μαριεύς, and not contrary to the alphabetical order, as L. and S. state.

70

ἱλλάδας γονάς

70 Hesych. ii p. 356 ἱλλάδας γονάς· ἀγελαίας (so Musurus for ἀγελαίας cod.) και τὰς συστροφάς. Εὐριπίδης Φρίξ (fr. 837) και Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρισίω.

ἱλλάδας γονάς, 'herding produce.' The adj. is aptly used of the cattle crowding or pressing together, as they are driven. Cf. Rom. θ 215. I have very little doubt that this was Hesychius' explanation, and that we ought to read ἀγελαίας κατὰ τὰς συστροφάς. For συστρέφειν, συστροφή are regularly used by the lexicographers in glossing ἱλλειν (εἰλλειν) and ἱλη: schol. Ar. Ran. 1066 περιλλόμενος) ἀντὶ τοῦ περιεληθεῖς ἢ συστροφείς. ἱλλειν γὰρ τὸ συστρέφειν. Suid. s.v. ἱλας. ἀγέλας ἢ τάξεις...ἱλη γὰρ συστροφή, id. s.v. εἰληδόν. κατὰ συστροφὴν (so Hesych.). s.v. εἰληδόν. συνεστραμμένως. Hesych. ii p. 28 εἰλην· συστροφήν, πλήθος. p. 29 εἰλομένων· συστροφόμενων ἐν πολέμῳ. p. 356 ἱλαί· τάξεις. συστροφαί. Etyim. M. p. 361, 44 explains the Homeric ἱλλάδες (N 572) as οἱ συνεστραμμένοι ἱμάντες. It appears, then, that L. Dindorf (Thes. ii p. 711) should not have deleted the words και τὰς συστροφάς. He went on to explain ἱλλάδες γοναί as referring to plough-oxen, comparing Ant. 341 ἱλομένων ἀρότρων. I presume he took ἱλλάδες as 'turning to and fro,' but this is hardly conceivable without the addition of (e.g.) ἀρότρους. For the meaning of ἱλλειν Buttmann's article (Lexil. § 44) is still worth reading.—For the concrete use of γονάς cf. Aesch. fr. 194 ἱππων ὄνων τ' ὄχεα και ταύρων γονάς. Here the adj. takes the place of a genitive (ἀγελῶν), as in At. 71 αἰχμηλωτίδας χέρας (Jebb).

71

ἄδοξα

71 Hesych. i p. 47 ἄδοξα· παράδοξα και <α> οὐκ ἂν τις ἐδόξασεν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρισίω (ἀκρισιω cod.). Phot. ed. Reitz, p. 33, 7 (Bekk. anacl. p. 344, 27) ἄδοξα· τὰ παράδοξα, ἃ οὐκ ἂν τις δοξάσειεν. (=Phryn. fr. 79 de B.) In the same sense Sophocles employs also ἀδόκτος, ἀδόξαστος (fr. 223), ἀελπτος, ἀέλπιστος. In spite of its rarity, ἄδοξος must have been well-established as 'improbable'; for it is so used several times by Aristotle in the topica: see (e.g.) 9. 12. 173^a 26 τοῖς δὲ πολλοῖς ἄδοξον τὸ βασιλέα μὴ εἶδαι μανεῖν.

72

ἀνταίαν

72 Hesych. i p. 209 ἀνταίαν· ἔκτοπον, χαλεπὴν. Σοφοκλῆς ισίω (Musurus restored Ἀκρισίω). The meaning of ἀνταίαν is discussed on fr. 334. ἔκτοπον means 'strange,' in the sense of 'startling,' Hesych. ii p. 54 ἔκτοπον· χαλεπὴν. ξένον.

73

ἀπόδρομον

73 Hesych. i p. 245 ἀπόδρομον· ἐλαττούμενον τοῖς δρόμοις. ἢ παλινδρομον. ἢ μετ' ἐπ' ἀνόνδον. ἀκρησίω (Σοφοκλῆς 'Ακρησίω Musurus). This is extremely obscure, and Ellendt corrects μετ' ἐπ' ἀνόνδον, with the intention, I suppose, of accommodating it to παλινδρομον. Our only other authority for ἀπόδρομος is to be found in certain passages of Eustathius (II. p. 727, 21, Od. p. 1592, 56, p. 1788, 56). Eustathius takes his information in part from Alexion, a grammarian in the latter half of the first century A.D., who drew from the best Alexandrian sources. According to Eustathius ἀπόδρομος was used in two senses: (1) ὡς ἡδὴ πεπαυμένον ἀπὸ τῶν δρόμων. This use is ascribed to 'certain of the ancients' on the analogy of ἀπόμαχος. (2) As a name given to the ἔφηβοι by the Cretans, διὰ τὸ μηδέπω τῶν κοινῶν δρόμων μετέχειν. It may here be mentioned that M. Schmidt thought ἀκρησίω in Hesych. was an error for παρὰ Κρησί. He does not quote Eustathius; nor would Eustath. throw any light on the obscurity of Hesych., even if Schmidt's conjecture were right. It is perhaps more probable that Soph. used the word in the former of the two senses recorded by Eustath.; and Hesych.'s ἐλαττούμενον τοῖς δρόμοις may refer to one who was too weak to compete in a race. We can hardly go further, but the alternatives lead me to suspect that ἀπόδρομος was employed metaphorically. Hartung quite unjustifiably interprets 'a runaway slave,' and compares fr. 63.

74

ἀποφανθείς

74 Hesych. i p. 262 ἀποφανθείς· ἐν τῷ φανερῷ καταστάς. Σοφοκλῆς 'Ακρησίω. Cf. Ar. Νηὶ. 352 ἀποφαίνουσαι τὴν φύσιν αὐτοῦ λύκοι ἐξαφίνης ἐγένοντο, and see fr. 1023.

75

ἀρώματα

75 Hesych. i p. 295 ἀρώματα (ἀρώματα cod., against the order of letters: corr. Voss)· ἀροτρίσματα (or perh. rather ἀροτρίσματα, as M. Schmidt conjectured). καὶ ἀπὸ (ἐπὶ cod.: corr. Heinsius) τοῦ ἀροῦν τὰ ἀλφίτα οὕτω λέγεται. Σοφοκλῆς 'Ακρησίω (ἄκρησι cod.: corr. Musurus). The inference to be drawn from this is that Sophocles used ἀρώματα in the sense of arable land, not for ἀλφίτα which would hardly be credible. Cf. Ar. Pac. 1158 εὐ ποιοῦντος κώφελοντος τοῦ θεοῦ τάρωματα, where the schol. makes it plain that the mention of ἀλφίτα in Hesych. actually refers to a passage of Eupolis: τὰ ἀροτρίσματα, παρὰ τὸ ἀροτρίων. τὰ προηροτρίσματα. λέγουσι δὲ ἐνιοὶ καὶ τὰ ἀλφίτα καὶ τὸν λιβανωτὸν ἀρώματα, ὡς παρ' Εὐπολίδι (fr. 304 I 336 K.) 'καὶ εὐθὺ τῶν ἀρωμάτων,' ἀντὶ τοῦ τῶν ἀλφίτων.

The word is entirely distinct from ἀρώματα = ἐπιθυμιάματα (Apoll. lex. p. 41, 29): hence Bekk. anecd. p. 450, 13 ἀρώματα οὐ τὰ θυμιάματα οἱ Ἀττικοὶ καλοῦσιν, ἀλλὰ τὰ ἐσπαρμένα. With Eupolis we are not concerned, but it might be thought that crops rather than tilth is the meaning to be inferred for Sophocles. That this is not the case is shown by Lucian Lexiph. 2 ἐγὼ δὲ περιελθὼν τὰ ἀρώματα, σκόροδά τε εἶρον ἐν αὐτοῖς πεφυκότα, where the schol. has ἀρώματα δὲ τὰ ἀρότρω ἐξεργασμένα πεδία, Aelian n. a. 7. 8 ὅς ἐστι ἐν τοῖς ἀρώμασι φαινόμεναι, 16. 14 ἐν τοῖς βαθέσι ἀρώμασιν. For the late form aroma, which is to be rejected, see Cobet, V. L. p. 85. The spread of the short penultimate in late Greek is illustrated from the papyri by J. H. Moulton in C. R. xviii 108.

ἄστομος

76 Hesych. i p. 306 ἄστομος· ὁ μὴ δυνάμενος λέγειν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀκρισίφ. ἄστομος, elsewhere of a hard-mouthed horse (El. 714), is here a synonym of ἀνανδός, ἀφθογγός, ἀφώνος, ἀψόφητος etc. This is possible because στόμα had become familiar in the sense of 'speech': σοῦ γ' εἰς τὸδ' ἐξεληθόντος ἀνίσσιν στόμα

O. C. 981. In Strabo 70 οἱ τοὺς ἀστόμους τε καὶ ἄρρινας ἰστοροῦντες and in Lucian Lexiph. 15 ἀλογίαν ἡμῶν ἐπιτάττεις ὡς ἀστόμους οὖσι καὶ ἀπεγγλωτισμένους the meaning is different, 'without a mouth.' But cf. Epict. diss. 2. 24. 26, Achilles reduces Odysseus and Phoenix to silence (ἀστόμους πεποίηκε).

ΑΛΕΑΔΑΙ

The mistaken correction of the title to Ἀλώαδαι was due to Hemsterhuis on Lucian Charon 3 p. 494, and was supported by an explanation of fr. 89 from Apollod. 1. 55, where Artemis takes the form of a stag, and by a stratagem induces Otus and Ephialtes to shoot each other. But ἔκηλος is inconsistent with this view.

Subsequent investigation has decisively shown that the subject of the play was the fortunes of Auge and her son Telephus, and the credit of establishing the truth belongs to Fr. Vater, who in his dissertation die Aleaden des Sophokles, Berlin, 1835, first pointed out the significance for the present purpose of a passage in one of the declamations attributed to Alcidas (Odys. 13—16, p. 187 Bl.²). It is there related how Aleos, king of Tegea, went to Delphi and received an oracle from the god, warning him that, if his daughter bore a son, his own sons must die by the hand of his grandson. Accordingly, on his return home, Aleos made his daughter Auge priestess of Athena, vowing that he would kill her if she ever became a wife. It so happened that Heracles came to Tegea, when on his way to Elis to attack Augeas, and was entertained by Aleos in the temple of Athena. Heracles saw the girl, met her in secret, and left her pregnant. When Aleos discovered the state of affairs, he sent for Nauplius, king of Euboea, and handed over Auge to him, with directions that she should be drowned¹. However, on the journey from Tegea, Auge gave birth to Telephus on Mt Parthenius; and Nauplius, disregarding his instructions, sold mother and child to be conveyed across the sea to King Teuthras in Mysia. Teuthras, who was childless, married Auge, and adopted her son, to whom he gave the name

¹ Cf. the similar story of Aerope, related in the Κρήσσαι of Euripides: schol. Al. 1295, Apollod. 3. 15.

Telephus. The story was current in several versions, but the importance of the account preserved by Alcidas is that he alone refers to the oracle given to Aleos, and mentions this as the reason why Auge was entrusted to Nauplius. This at once explains the title of Sophocles' play. Confirmation of Alcidas is to be found in Proverb. Append. 2. 87 (Paroem. I 412) as well as in Hygin. fab. 244 Telephus Herculis filius Hippothoum et Neerae aviae suae filios (sc. occidit)¹. It will be seen that the name of the other son is lost, and Hippothous is nowhere else mentioned as a son of Aleos. Apollod. 3. 102 calls the sons of Aleos and Neaera by the names Cepheus and Lycurgus, whereas Pausan. 8. 4. 8 and Ap. Rhod. 1. 161 ff. make them three in number, Lycurgus, Cepheus, and Amphidamas.

As contrasted with the account of Alcidas, that of Apollodorus (2. 146) mentions temple-defilement and consequent λοιμός (or λιμός, as in 3. 103) as the causes which induced Aleos to hand over Auge to Nauplius and to expose her child. Diodorus, however, whose version is more rationalistic, simply relates (4. 33) that Aleos discovered his daughter to be pregnant, and sent her away in disgrace, not believing her story that she was with child by Heracles. In regard to the circumstances of the birth of Telephus, Sophocles and Alcidas followed different versions; for the latter allows no place for the suckling of the infant by a hind, which is clearly referred to in fr. 89. Here, therefore, the Sophoclean plot approximated to the story as related in Diodorus, Apollod. ll. cc., Pausan. 8. 48. 7, 54. 6². It is reasonable to infer that, according to Sophocles, Telephus was reared by the herdsmen of King Corythus³, or by Corythus himself; and that the question of his birth in some way or other presented itself to him, when he was grown to manhood. According to Apollod. 3. 104 and Diod. l.c. he went to Delphi to enquire of the oracle, and was sent by the god to Mysia. It will be observed that the above-mentioned authorities do not give any information concerning the return of Telephus to the palace of Aleos, or the manner in which he killed his uncles. The gap can only be filled by conjecture, and there is nothing to help us except that frs. 86, 87 appear to belong to a scene in which a question of doubtful birth was canvassed. Wernicke (in Pauly-Wissowa II 2302) inferred that Telephus was mocked by

¹ The text is corrupt, but M. Schmidt is doubtless right in restoring Neerae for Nerea from ib. 243 Neera Autolyxi filia propter Hippothoi filii mortem (sc. se ipsa interfecit). Robert however prefers (Arch. Jahrb. III 61) to read Perea for Nerea and Hippothoi et... filiorum in 243.

² The incident was hardly a late invention, as Jahn supposed: Frazer, Pausan. IV p. 437.

³ The eponym of the Κορυθῆς in Arcadia (Pausan. 8. 45. 1; 54. 5).

Hippothous and his brother for the obscurity of his origin, and that he slew them in anger; that subsequently Aleos demanded his surrender from Corythus; that in consequence of the explanation given he recognized his grandson; and that he then required him to consult the oracle in order to learn how he should expiate his blood-guilt. Robert (Arch. Jahrb. III 61 ff.) thinks it more likely that the strife between Telephus and the Aleadae arose out of some incident similar to the Calydonian hunt in the legend of Meleager. He points out that in that case fr. 84 suitably describes the overthrow of two princes of the royal house by a foreign bastard. This carries the story to the period which is covered by the action of the Mysians. Welcker (p. 413) preferred to suppose that Heracles appeared as deus ex machina to clear up the dispute, and ordered Telephus to go to Mysia¹.

It should be observed that an entirely different version of the story was adopted by Euripides, to the effect that mother and child were cast adrift together in a chest by Aleos, but ultimately reached the mouth of the Caicus, and were rescued by Teuthras (Strabo 615). Such at least was the account given in the prologue to the Telephus; for in the later Auge Telephus was separated from his mother and exposed (Wilamowitz, Anal. Eur. p. 189 f.). The simpler story, which is parallel to that of Danae, was given by Hecataeus (Pausan. 8. 4. 8), and is believed, although the reasons assigned are hardly convincing, to have been derived from the Cypria and Little Iliad (Wernicke, u.s. 2300). The Pergamene dynasty established by Attalus traced their descent from Telephus, and the people claimed to be Arcadians sprung from the band which crossed with Telephus to Asia. Thus they were precluded from giving official recognition to the λάρναξ-story, and followed in preference, as has been shown exhaustively by Robert (Arch. Jahrb. II 244, III 45, 87), the versions of Aeschylus and Sophocles. See also Frazer, Pausan. II p. 76.

77

ἐνταῦθα μέντοι πάντα τὰνθρώπων νοσεῖ,
κακοῖς ὅταν θελωσιν ἰᾶσθαι κακά.

77 Stob. flor. 4. 37 (III p. 228, 17 Hense) Σοφοκλέους. 'ἐνταῦθα...κακά.' The extract is omitted in SMA, ed. Trinc. gives as above, and 'Ἀλεάδαις' is added after Σοφοκλέους by two of Schow's

MSS known as B, C. For these see Hense in Rh. Mus. XLI 59 f.

1 ἐνταῦθα looks forward to the following clause: cf. Eur. fr. 497 καὶ γὰρ ἐντεῦθεν νοσεῖ τὰ τῶν γυναικῶν οἱ μὲν κτέ.

¹ So also Fr. Vater, op. cit. p. 25.

Hel. 306 ἐν τῷδε γὰρ κάμνουσιν αἱ πολλαὶ πόλεις, | ὅταν τις κτέ. Hel. 581 ἐκεῖ νοσοῦμεν, ὅτι δάμαρτ' ἄλλην ἔχω. I.T. 1018 τῇδε γὰρ νοσεῖ | νόστος πρὸς οἶκον looks backward. For the use of ὅταν see A.J.P. xxxiii 428.

2 κακοῖς κτέ. For the proverb κακὸν κακῷ ἰᾶσθαι cf. Aesch. fr. 349 μη κακοῖς ἰῶ κακά, Soph. fr. 589, Al. 362 μη κακὸν κακῷ διδοῦς | ἄκος πλεον τὸ πῆμα τῆς ἀτης

τίθει, where Jebb gives other illustrations. See also on fr. 854. Plut. de garrul. 4 p. 504 B ἐστι δὲ θεραπέων τῆς νόσου βαρύτερος (sc. ὁ ἀδόλεσχος), where the doctor himself rather than his drugs is at fault. Similarly Eur. Bacch. 839 κακοῖς θηρῶν κακά, Aelian nat. an. 3. 47 (of Oedipus) μη τῷ οἴκῳ καὶ τῷ γένει καταρῶμενον εἶτα μέντοι κακῷ ἀνηκέστῳ ἰᾶσθαι κακά τὰ ἤδη παρελθόντα.

78

τοῖς γὰρ δικάοις ἀντέχειν οὐ ράδιον.

78 Stob. flor. 9. 4 (III p. 346, 14 Hense) Σοφοκλέους (Εὐριπίδου Α) 'Ἀλεάδαι (ἀλαιάδαι M, ἀλωάδαι A). 'τοῖς... ῥάδιον.'

This is the converse of our proverb 'Might is Right.' Cf. Q.C. 880 τοῖς τοι δικάοις χῶ βραχὺς νικᾷ μέγαν. Eur.

Syll. 437 νικᾷ δ' ὁ μείων τὸν μέγαν δίκαι' ἔχων. Eur. fr. 584 εἰς τοι δίκαιος μυρίων οὐκ ἐνδίκων | κρατεῖ, τὸ θεῖον τὴν δίκην τε συλλαβῶν. These are variations of the simple theme in Eur. fr. 343 θάρσει τὸ τοι δίκαιον ἰσχύει μέγα. See also fr. 80.

79

κακὸν τὸ κεῦθειν κοῦ πρὸς ἀνδρὸς εὐγενούς.

79 κού Gesner: καὶ S

79 Stob. flor. 12. 3 (III p. 444, 8 Hense) τοῦ αὐτοῦ (sc. Σοφοκλέους) 'Ἀλεάδης. 'κακὸν...εὐγενούς.' The extract is contained in S only of Hense's MSS.

κεῦθειν, i.e. to hide one's true thought. Cf. Hom. I 312 ἐχθρὸς γάρ μοι κείνος ὁμῶς 'Αἰδᾶο πύλησιν, | ὅς χ' ἕτερον μὲν κεῖθι ἐνὶ φρεσὶν ἄλλο δὲ εἴπῃ. Pseudo-Phocylides 48 μηδ' ἕτερον κεῖθις κραδίῃ νόον, ἀλλ' ἀγορεύων. Sall. Cat. 10. For the absolute use of κεῦθειν in the transitive sense cf.

Trach. 988, Aesch. Cho. 101 μη κεῖθιρ' ἐνδον καρδίας φόβῳ τιναί, 'don't practise concealment.' Herwerden conj. κλέπτειν. With the addition, noblesse oblige, cf. Chaeremon fr. 27 (TGF p. 789) ψευδῆ δὲ τοῖς ἐσθλοῖσιν οὐ πρέπει λέγειν.—πρὸς: 'befitting' (proceeding from). For this idiom see my n. on Eur. Hel. 950 and Blaydes on Al. 319. So fr. 319.—For καὶ and κοῦ confused Campbell refers to Trach. 1046.

80

καὶ γὰρ δικαία γλῶσσ' ἔχει κράτος μέγα.

80 Stob. flor. 13. 6 (III p. 457, 10 Hense) Σοφοκλέους ἐξ 'Ἀλεαδῶν (L has ἐξ 'Ἀλεαδῶν without the poet's name: Σοφοκλέους 'Ἀλεαδᾶι SMA) καὶ γὰρ...μέγα.

For the sentiment see on fr. 78. It is referred to also in Phil. 1245 f. σὺ δ' οὐτε φωνεῖς οὐτε δραστεῖς σοφά. | ἀλλ' εἰ δίκαια, τῶν σοφῶν κρείσσω τάδε.

81

ὦ παῖ, σιώπα· πόλλ' ἔχει σιγὴ καλὰ.

81 σιγὴ M et Plut.: σιωπῇ S

81 Stob. flor. 33. 3 (III p. 678, 10 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀλεάδαις (αἰλέασι M, but S omits the name of the play, and A the whole extract). 'ὦ...καλὰ.' Plut. de garrul. 2 p. 502 E εἰπωμεν πρὸς τὸν Ἀδόλεσχον 'ὦ...καλὰ.' Arsenius p. 737, 9 (= Apostol. XVIII 62 a) assigns the line to Menander, but Dindorf and Hense point out that this is due to the fact that Menander is the author of the verse immediately preceding it in Stobaeus.

The verse is not a general recommendation of silence; and the context would probably have shown that silence was enjoined in painful circumstances, where the truth must be avoided. Such at least was the ordinary man's morality: see Pind. Nem. 5. 16 οὐτοί ἅπαντα κερδίων | φαίνουσα πρόσωπον ἀλάθει' ἀτρεκής | καὶ τὸ σιγᾶν πολλάκις ἐστὶ σοφώτατον ἀνθρώπῳ νοῆσαι, fr. 180 ἐσθ' ὅτε πιστοτάτα σιγᾶς ὁδός· κέντρον δὲ μάχης ὁ κρατιστεύων λόγος. Aesch. fr. 188 πολλοὺς γὰρ ἐστὶ κέρδος ἡ σιγὴ βροτῶν. Ag. 553 πάλαι τὸ σιγᾶν φάρμακον βλάβης ἔχω should be compared with Carcin. fr. 7 πολλῶν γὰρ ἀνθρώποισι φάρμακον κακῶν | σιγῇ.—πολλὰ...καλὰ in place of the more usual πολλὰ καὶ καλὰ: see Jebb on Phil. 583.

82

τί ταῦτα πολλῶν ῥημάτων ἔτ' ἔστι σοι;
τὰ γὰρ περισσὰ πανταχοῦ λυπήρ' ἔπη.

82 Stob. flor. 36. 11 (III p. 692, 12 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀλεάδαις. 'τί...ἔπη.'

1 'Why should this still need many words from you?' Herwerden conjectured ῥημάτων ἐπαξίους, but ἐτι is indispensable (better ἔτ' ἀξίους, as Hense says) and the genitive (descriptive, = 'requiring many words') is idiomatic: Plat. Gorg. 461 A ταῦτα οὖν ὅπη ποτὲ ἔχει, οὐκ ὀλίγης συνουσίας ἔστιν ὥστε ἱκανῶς διασκέψασθαι. H. quotes Pind. Nem. 10. 46 μακροτέρας γὰρ ἀριθμῆσαι σχολᾶς. Herodian Philol. (Pierson's Moeris, p. 475) ὀλίγης ἐστὶ διδασκαλίας, ἀντὶ τοῦ, ὀλίγων δεῖται πρὸς μάθησιν. Euenus fr. 1, 5 τοὺς ζυνετοῦς... οὐκ ἐπὶ καὶ ῥήσιν εἰσι διδασκαλίας.

2 περισσὰ is used as in Aesch. Theb. 1034 περισσὰ κηρύσσειν. Cf. Eur. Suppl. 459 περισσὰ φωνῶν, Med. 819 περισσοί πάντες οὖν μέσφ' λόγοι. But in O. T. 841 περισσὸν λόγων means 'remarkable, of special note.'

83

μὴ πάντ' ἐρεῦνα· πολλὰ καὶ λαθεῖν καλόν.

83 λαθεῖν καλόν Blomfield: λαθεῖν κακόν codd.

83 Stob. flor. 41. 4 (III p. 758, 5 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀλεάδαις. 'μὴ...καλόν.'

The verse is a pendant of fr. 81: 'Silence is good, where there is a skeleton in the house.' On the other hand, good fortune should be proclaimed to all. Cf. Pind. Pyth. 3. 83 τὰ καλὰ τρέψαντες ἔξω. fr. 42 καλῶν μὲν ὧν μοῖραν τε τερπνῶν ἐς μέσον χρή παντὶ λαῶ | δέκνυνται· εἰ δέ τις ἀνθρώ- | ποισι θεόδοτος ἀγλάτα κακότης | προσ-

τύχη, ταῦταν σκότει κρύπτειν ἔουκεν, Eur. fr. 460. See on fr. 64, where the phrase σιγὴ κόσμος is discussed: it is worth notice that, in the passages there mentioned, Bacchylides takes the conventional view, whereas Euripides advocated the dignity of silence. Blomfield's correction is strongly supported by Eur. Hipp. 465 ἐν σοφοῖσι γὰρ | τὰδ' ἐστὶ θνητῶν, λαυθάνειν τὰ μὴ καλὰ. Blaydes thought τοι preferable to καὶ; but see on fr. 23.

84

κοῦκ οἶδ' ὅτι χρή πρὸς ταῦτα λέγειν, ὅταν οἱ γ' ἀγαθοὶ πρὸς τῶν ἀγενῶν κατανικῶνται.
ποία πόλις ἂν τάδ' ἐνέγκοι;

84. 2 γ' Valckenaer: τ' codd. | ἀγενῶν Grotius: ἀγενῶν codd.

84 Stob. flor. 43. 6 (IV p. 2, 12 Hense) Σοφοκλέους (τοῦ αὐτοῦ S) Ἀλεάδαι. 'κοῦκ... ἐνέγκοι.' Also in corp. Par. 716 Elter, with χρή omitted in v. 1.

The non-committal punctuation adopted by Dindorf and Nauck, who, keeping τ' in v. 2, print commas after λέγειν and κατανικῶνται, leaves the connexion of the clauses obscure. But τ' does not seem to be in place as a connective, whether or not a heavier stop is placed after λέγειν. I have followed Valckenaer in giving γ' for τ', and in joining the δταν clause with the words which precede it. The subordinate clause then conveys a causal implication, as in Phil. 451 πού χρή τιθεσθαι ταῦτα, πού δ' αἰνεῖν, δταν | τὰ θεῖ' ἐπαιῶν τοὺς θεοὺς εὖρω κακοὺς. For δταν so used see my paper in A.J.P. XXXIII 426 ff.

The appearance of γε, as after ὅποτε, ὅπου, ἐπειδὴ, εἴτε and the like, is idiomatic: see Neil's Equites p. 190, Kuehner-Gerth § 509, 9 (c), and cf. At. 715, Phil. 1099. H. points out that a similar question arises in Phil. 456, where γ' is given as a variant for δ' in L and is the reading of several other MSS. But, independently of authority, the case for δ' is strong there. Robert, retaining τ', assumes a lacuna after κατανικῶνται. Hense suggests οἱ λαμπροὶ or the like.

2 f. For the political conditions assumed, the overthrow of the nobles by the masses, see on fr. 192. ἀγενῶν shows that in ἀγαθοὶ the political meaning is foremost.—κατανικῶνται: the compound does not seem to occur elsewhere (τάδε—or πολὺ—νικῶνται conj. Blaydes, μέγα νικῶνται Herwerden).—πρὸς: fr. 932.

4 τάδε, 'things like these,' of what has been mentioned: cf. Thuc. 2. 71 τάδε μὲν ἡμῖν πατέρες οἱ ὑμέτεροι ἔδοσαν.

85

δοκῶ μὲν, οὐδεὶς· ἀλλ' ὅρα μὴ κρεῖσσον ἤ καὶ δυσσεβοῦντα τῶν ἐναντίων κρατεῖν ἢ δοῦλον αὐτὸν ὄντα τῶν πέλας κλύειν.

85 Stob. flor. 54. 21 (IV p. 351, 5 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀλεαδῶν (ἀλεαδῶν M, ἀλεαδῶν primitus A). 'δοκῶ... κλύειν.'

1 'The preceding sentence must have been "Who would willingly be irreligious?" τίς ἂν ἐκὼν ἔλοιτο δυσσεβεῖς εἶναι;' (H.) F. W. Schmidt needlessly wished to alter οὐδεὶς to ἀθεός or ἀσεβής.—δοκῶ μὲν: an instance of μὲν solitarium; for it must not be supposed that μὲν is answered by ἀλλ' ὅρα. Eur. Hec. 218 f., Soph. O. T. 1051 should be distinguished: in the one case ἀλλά and in the other ἀτάρ introduces the explicit contrast. For μὲν accompanying and emphasizing δοκῶ and other verbs cf. Eur. Hel. 917 (n.), 1205, Soph. O. C. 995, El. 61, Phil. 339. Many examples in other authors are collected by Blaydes on Ar. Pac. 47. For μὲν solitarium in comedy see Starkie on Vesp. 77; and for the orators Wyse on Isae. 1 r.

ὅρα μὴ... ἤ. For the subjunctive see Jebb on Phil. 30. Its use here in preference to the indicative shows that the speaker is rather looking forward to the circumstances of the particular case than weighing the general application of the maxim.

2 f. Several critics have missed an antithesis to δυσσεβοῦντα which they expect to find in v. 3. Thus for ἢ δούλων αὐτὸν ὄντα Cobet substituted ἢ τοὺς θεοὺς σέβοντα, F. W. Schmidt ἢ δαίμονας τιμῶντα, Vitelli ἢ δούλων αὐθιγῶν ὄντα and

Weil ἡ δοῦλον ἀγνὸν ὄντα; Papageorgius changed δοῦλον to χρηστὸν, and Nauck conjectured δειλὸν for δοῦλον. But the presence of καὶ and αὐτὸν shows that these corrections are misconceived: the thought is, 'It is better to conquer one's foes even by foul means than to be so reduced as to be the slave of others.' To a free-born Greek slavery is the worst of all evils; hence the arrogant note in αὐτὸν, which contrasts as in Phil. 316. For the φύσει δοῦλοι the case is different. It is not so much slavery that is contrasted with sovereignty, as degradation with power once enjoyed. In Eur. Phoen. 524 f. εἴπερ γὰρ ἀδικεῖν χρή, τυραννίδος πέρι | κάλλιστον ἀδικεῖν· τᾶλλα δ' εὖσεβεῖν χρεών, sovereignty is taken as the supreme limit of happiness, the attainment of which justifies ἀδικία, much as here stress is laid on slavery as the extremity of misfortune. In Aesch. Ag. 478 the Chorus pray for the middle state: μήτ' εἴην πολυπύρρης, | μήτ' οὖν αὐτὸς ἀλοῦς ὕπ' ἄλγος βίαν καταίδοιμι. H. compared Trag. fr. adesp. 181 εἰ με κερδαίνοντα κεκλησθαι κακόν | κρείσσον γὰρ ἢ σέβοντα τοὺς θεῶν νόμους | πένητα ναίειν δόξαν ἡμποληκότα, and with v. 3 Eur. Hel. 730 κρείσσον γὰρ τὸδ' (i.e. to be a loyal slave with a mind free) ἢ δουρὶν κακοῖν | ἐν' ὄντα χρῆσθαι, τὰς φρένας τ' ἔχειν κακὰς, | ἄλλων τ' ἀκούειν δοῦλον ὄντα τῶν πέλας. Add Ani. 479 ὅστις δοῦλός ἐστι τῶν πέλας. Gomperz, who at one time was inclined to follow Cobet in suspecting the text, subsequently defended it on similar lines to the view taken above (Nachlese, p. 5).

86

παῦσαι. καταρκεῖ τοῦδε κεκλησθαι πατρός, εἴπερ πέφυκά γ'. εἰ δὲ μή, μείων βλαβή.
τό τοι νομισθέν τῆς ἀληθείας κρατεῖ.

86. 2 μείων Gesner: μείζων SA, μείζων M 3 τοι] τι A primitus

86 Stob. Flor. 76. 9 (IV p. 610, 2 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεάδαις (ἀλεάδες A). 'παῦσαι...κρατεῖ.'

We may perhaps assume that these words were spoken by Telephus in reference to the supposed parentage of Heracles (or Corythus).

1 κεκλησθαι πατρός: cf. fr. 564 (n.). For the gen. cf. Trach. 1105 ὁ τῆς ἀρίστης μητρὸς ὀνομασμένος.

2 εἴπερ πέφυκά γ'. For the meaning of εἴπερ (cf. γ' see the exhaustive discussion by E. S. Thompson in his edition of the Alcistis, p. 258 ff. Here εἴπερ bears its common meaning of si modo (fr. 104 n.), but the addition of γ' changes the tone. It is impossible to reproduce the nuances of Greek particles in English; but the speech-stress, which we indicate by the use of italics in printing, may serve roughly to convey the difference between εἴπερ πέφυκα, 'If I am his son,' and εἴπερ πέφυκά γ', 'If I am his son.' Cf. Plat. Euthyphr. 8 c τοῦτο γάρ, οἶμαι, οὐ τοιμῶσι λέγειν...ὥς οὐχί, εἴπερ ἀδικοῦσί γε, δοτεῖν δίκην. For εἴπερ γε in dialogue see on Eur. Phoen. 725, 1652.—μείων βλαβή: i.e., to be called the son of such a father rather than to learn the truth.

3 τό τοι νομισθέν κτέ. Cf. the well-known conclusion of Gray's ode On a distant prospect of Eton College, 'Thought would destroy their Paradise. | No more; where ignorance is bliss, 'tis folly to be wise.' So Eur. fr. 205 φρονῶ δ' δὲ πάσχω· καὶ τὸδ' οὐ σμικρὸν κακόν· | τὸ μὴ εἶδέναι γὰρ ἡδονὴν ἔχει τινὰ | νοσοῦντα· κέρδος δ' ἐν κακοῖς ἀγνωσία. Apollod. Caryst. fr. 10 (III 284 K.). οἱ γὰρ ἀτυχοῦντες τὸν χρόνον κερδαίνουσι | ὅπου ἂν ἀγνοῦμεν ἡνυχῆ-κότες. This comes from the Haecyru, which was translated by Terence, and the corresponding lines in his version are 286 f. nam nos omnes, quibus est alicunde aliquis obiectus labor, | omne quod est interea tempus prius quam id rescitum est lucro est. See also on fr. 583. 5. Al. 554 τὸ μὴ φρονεῖν γὰρ κατ' ἀνθρώπων κακόν. Eur. Bacch. 1259 ff. Or. 236 κρείσσον δὲ τὸ δοκεῖν, κἂν ἀληθείας ἀπῆ.

87

- A. ὁδ', εἰ νόθος τις, γνησίοις ἴσον σθένει.
B. ἅπαν τὸ χρηστὸν γνησίαν ἔχει φύσιν.

87. 1 ὁδ', εἰ scripsi: ὁ δ' εἰ codd., ὁ δὲ vulgo | τοῖς γνησίοις SM, τις τοῖς γνησίοις A: corr. Nauck | σθένει A 2 γνησίαν Stob.: τὴν ἴσιν Clem.

87 Stob. flor. 77. 9 (IV p. 614, 11 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεάδαις (-δες A, om. S). 'ὁ δ'... φύσιν.' The second v. is quoted by Clem. Alex. Strom. 6 p. 741 Σοφοκλέους δὲ ἐξ Ἀλεαδῶν ἅπαν τὸ χρηστὸν τὴν ἴσιν ἔχει φύσιν.

The spirit of the second line ('Tis only noble to be good') is after the manner of Euripides: El. 384 τῇ δ' ὁμολία βροτοῦς | κρινεῖτε καὶ τοῖς ἡθεσιν τοὺς εὐγενεῖς. fr. 336 ὁ μὲν γὰρ ἐσθλὸς εὐγενὴς ἐμοῦ | ἀνὴρ. fr. 53 οὐκ ἔστιν ἐν κακοῖσιν εὐγένεια, | παρ' ἀγαθοῖσι δ' ἀνδρῶν. Similarly with special reference to the stigma of bastardy: Andr. 638 νόθοι τε πολλοὶ γνησίων ἀμείνονες. fr. 141 τῶν γνησίων γὰρ οὐδὲν ὄντες ἐνδεεῖς (sc. νόθοι) | νόμῳ νοσοῦσιν. fr. 168 ἀνόματι μεμπτὸν τὸ νόθον, ἢ φύσιν δ' ἴση. fr. 377 μάτην δὲ θυητοὶ τοὺς νόθους φεύγοντες ἄρα | παῖδας φυτεύει· δὲ γὰρ ἂν χρηστὸς φύη, | οὐ τοῦ νομ' αὐτοῦ τὴν φύσιν διαφθερεῖ.

1 f. Nauck was the first to recognize that the verses should be divided between two speakers, but his suggestion that the first line should be read as a question (οὐ δὲ νόθος τις...σθένει; 'surely a mere bastard is not the equal of the well-born?') with οὐ δὲ interrogative as in Trach. 668, Phil. 900) throws an unusual emphasis on the indefinite pronoun. I have reverted to the reading of the MSS with ὁδ' for ὁ δ' (see cr. n.): 'he, as no other bastard...' Cf. Trach. 8 δκνον | ἀλγιστον ἔσχον, εἰ τις Αἰτωλὶς γυνή, O. C. 1664 ἀλλ' εἰ τις βροτῶν | θαυμαστός (sc. ἐξεπέμπετο), and the well-known attracted examples Al. 488, O. C. 734. See also Kuehner-Gerth II 573, Headlam on Aesch. Ag. 119. Campbell, who gives the lines to a single speaker, renders: 'But he, though in one way base, yet copes with the legitimate.' But the translation as italicized is hard to justify. R. Ellis, on the same assumption and with a comma at σθένει, proposed οὐδ' εἰ for ὁ δ' εἰ. But no satisfactory meaning could be elicited from this, unless χρηστὸν bore the sense of δυσγενής. Blaydes conjectured (inter alia) ἦν δ' ἢ νόθος τις.

88

- τὰ χρήματ' ἀνθρώποισιν εὐρίσκει φίλους,
αὐθις δὲ τιμάς, εἴτα τῆς ὑπερτάτης

88. 2 αὐθις] Nauck coni. εὐθὺς

88 The whole passage is quoted by Stob. flor. 91. 27 (IV p. 740, 17 Hense) from Σοφοκλέους Ἀλεάδαι. Vv. 6—10 appear in Plut. de aud. poet. 4 p. 21 B as from Sophocles. V. 1 was a well-known tag: see Menander monost. 500, and Stob. flor. 94. 8 (IV p. 770, 10 Hense), where it is attributed to Sophocles without the name of the play. Plut. de am. prol. 5 p. 497 B attributes it to Euripides, but, as he follows with δόναμιν τε πλείστην τῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις ἔχειν (Phoen. 440), it is clear that he intended to quote Phoen. 439. Nauck refers to Plaut. Stich. 522 res amicos invenit. It is thought that this passage is referred to by Dio Chrys. 7. 102 in the words τοῖς ὑπὸ Σοφοκλέους εἰς τὸν πλοῦτον εἰρημένους.

1 εὐρίσκει. O. Hense suggested that this was a gloss, which had taken the place of an original ἀφάνει, comparing Hesych. I p. 134 etc. But there is no reason for disturbing the text: cf. El. 1061.

τυραννίδος θακούσιν ἀγχίστην ἔδραν.
 ἔπειτα δ' οὐδεὶς ἐχθρὸς οὔτε φύεται πρὸς χρήμαθ' οἱ τε φύντες ἀρνοῦνται στυγεῖν. 5 δεινὸς γὰρ ἔρπειν πλούτος ἐς τε τὰ βατά
 καὶ πρὸς βέβηλα, χῶπόθεν πένης ἀνὴρ

3 θακούσιν Salmasius: τ' ἀγοῦσιν A, ἀκούσιν SM | ἀγχίστην SM: αλχίστην A, ἡδίστην B, ἐσχάτην M. Schmidt 4 sq. del. Hense 5 δεινὸς Plut.: ξένος SM, γένος A | ἐς τε Gesner: ἔσται Stobaei codd., πρὸς τε Plut. | τὰ βατά (τ' ἀβατά codd. Plut.) τὰ βατά Stobaei codd. 7 βέβηλα Vater: τὰ βατά Stob. Plut.

3 See cr. n. Other conjectures which have less probability are ταγοῦσιν Bothe, θάκησιν Fr. Vater and Meineke, θάκοισιν Ellendt, θεοῖσιν Weil and Wecklein. The reading of B looks like a bad conjecture, but is adopted by Dindorf (and Blaydes, who compares O. T. 541). For the confusion of ἀλχιστος and ἐσχατος see Cobet, Var. Lect. p. 144, where he corrects Lucian Pisc. 27. In support of ἐσχάτην J. refers to fr. 907 ἦδη γὰρ ἔδρα Ζεὺς ἐν ἐσχάτῃ θεῶν (n.). Cobet, Coll. Crit. p. 188, perhaps rightly, prefers ἀγχίστην, thinking that rich men whose influence is greatest with monarchs are said τῆς ὑπερτάτης τυραννίδος θακεῖν ἀγχίστην ἔδραν. Mekler conj. μακαριστὴν and Wecklein ἀρχικὴν. Gaisford approved ἐχθίστην, another word sometimes confused with αλχίστην.

4 f. are considered by O. Hense to be an intrusion, and Nauck agrees.—ἔπειτα δ', in the next place, distinguishes from the general advantages bestowed by wealth the particular fact that no one seeks to oppose its influence. 'Not only does no one become the foe of the rich man, but even his former enemies dissemble their hatred.' Meineke's οἱ τ' ἔχοντες is wide of the mark.—φύεται, denoting 'it is no one's nature to be' (cf. Tr. fr. adesp. 543 οὐκ ἐν γυναιξὶ φύεται πιστὴ χάρις), corresponds to φύντες—those in whom the condition is realized. For the strong aor. in this sense (which L. and S. wrongly say is rare) see Ant. 721 φύναι τὸν ἄνδρα πάντ' ἐπιστήμης πλέων ('prove to be'), O. C. 1444 ταῦτα δ' ἐν τῷ δαίμονι | καὶ τῆδε φύναι χάτερρα ('to be realized'), and many other instances in Sophocles. For te co-ordinated with οὕτε see Jebb on O. C. 1397 f., and Eur. Hel. 156, Helid. 454, Phoen. 891.

7 f. See cr. n. Other conjectures are γε τὰ βατά Blomfield (τὰ βατά γε Blaydes), τὰ βάσιμα Nauck, καὶ τὰ πρόσκιτα Campbell, τὰ βαῖα Schwartz, τὰ λευρά Hense. For the word βέβηλος see on fr. 570. There can be no reasonable doubt that τὰ βατά was a gloss on βέβηλα: see schol. on O. C. 10 βεβήλοισι βατοῖς, Suid. s.v. βέβηλος τόπος: ὁ βατὸς πᾶσι καὶ ἀκάθαρτος. Etyim. M. s.v. βέβηλος: ὁ μὴ ἱερὸς τόπος ἀκάθαρτος καὶ βατός. Bekk. anecd. p. 323, 13 ἀβέβηλα τὰ ἀβατά χωρία. Schol. Aesch. Suppl. 518 βέβηλον ἄλσος | τὸ πᾶσι βατὸν καὶ μὴ ἱερὸν. We might equally well have found τὰ βάσιμα, another scholastic word, which Nauck actually wished to put in the text. Madvig (Adv. Crit. p. 614) depraved it still further by proposing χῶποι θέλει πένης δ' ἀνὴρ. It will be observed that the addition of βέβηλα is redundant to the sense, and serves merely to round off the expression. The Greek love of antithesis was sometimes indulged at the expense of logic: El. 305 τὰς οὐσας τέ μοι καὶ τὰς ἀπούσας ἐλπίδας διέφθορον, Ant. 1109 ἔτ' ἔτ' ὀπάοντες, | ὧ τ' ὄντες ὧ τ' ἀπόντες. See also my note on Eur. Helid. 182 (with which passage Andoc. 4. 7 should be compared), and add Alcman fr. 23, 44 ἐμὲ δ' οὐτ' ἐπαινήν | οὐτε μωμήσθαι νιν ἂ κλενὰ χαράγος | οὐδ' ἁμῶς ἐγ. J. quotes Tr. fr. adesp. 436 δοῦλε, δεσποτῶν ἀκουε καὶ δίκαια κἀδικα, and 437. The subject is treated exhaustively by E. Kemmer, die polare Ausdrucksweise, 1903.

χῶπόθεν κτέ. The general sense is: 'And to such places where the poor man could not even obtain access so as to realize his desires.' The rich man alone has the entrée to influential quarters. We may illustrate by O. T. 597 f., where Creon parades the value of his influence with Oedipus: νῦν οἱ σέθεν χρήζοντες ἐκκαλοῦσίν με | τὸ γὰρ τυχεῖν αὐτοῖσι πᾶν ἐνταῦθ' ἐν. Either οὐδ' or μηδ' would serve, and J. preferred the generic μηδ', quoting Trach. 800 ἐνταῦθ' ἄπον με μὴ τις βέβηται βροτῶν; but it seems οὐδ' ἐντυχὼν δύναται' ἂν ὦν ἐρᾷ τυχεῖν.

καὶ γὰρ δυσειδὲς σῶμα καὶ δυσώνυμον γλώσση σοφὸν τίθησιν εὐμορφόν τ' ἰδεῖν. 10 μόνῳ δὲ χαίρειν κἂν νόσων ξυνουσίᾳ πάρεστιν αὐτῷ κάπικρύπτεσθαι κακά.

8 οὐδ' ἐντυχὼν Plut.: μηδ' εὐτυχὼν (—ὦν A) Stobaei codd. 9 δυσειδὲς καὶ σῶμα
καὶ A | δυσώνυμον: v. comm. 11 κἂν νόσων ξυνουσίᾳ Meineke: καὶ νοσείν ἐξουσία codd. 12 κάπικρύπτεσθαι Blaydes: κάπικρύψασθαι SM, κάπικρύψεσθαι A, κάποκρύπτεσθαι Nauck

more likely that οὐδέ would be supplanted by μηδέ than vice versa: see Cobet, Var. Lect. pp. 47, 315.—ἐντυχὼν is used in the special sense of intervening, obtaining an audience: cf. Dem. 19. 175 αὐτὸς δὲ ἰδὼς πάντα τὸν χρόνον ἐντυχγάνων οὐδ' ὅτι οὐκ ἐπαύσατο Φιλίππῳ. This sense became very common in later Greek: hence ἐντευξίς, ἐντευκτικός, δυσέντευκτος, and even ἐντευξίδιον (a petition).—The careless repetition of τυχεῖν after ἐντυχὼν is excused by the meaning of the latter: Eur. Hel. 674 (n.). Meineke's οὐδ' εὐστοχῶν is unnecessary.—The negative qualifies both the participle and the main verb, as in Aesch. Ag. 302 δ' ὅσπερ μέλλων οὐδ' ἀφρασίμῳς ἔσθ' | νικώμενος παρήκεν ἀγγέλου μέρος: see n. on Eur. Helid. 813.—The explanation recommended above is confirmed by the emphasis which falls more strongly upon οὐδ' ἐντυχὼν than upon τυχεῖν. J., however, joins τυχεῖν to δεῦρος, interpreting: 'And knows how to obtain the objects of its desire in quarters from which the poor man could not obtain those objects, even if they came in his way.' In other words, 'Wealth wins its way to places which are wholly inaccessible to poverty. But even in quarters to which poverty may chance to have access, wealth succeeds where the other fails.' Tucker proposed μηδ' ἐν γ' ἔσθ' quoting Solon ap. Arist. Ath. pol. 13 (p. 48 S.), but the change is unnecessary. So also is Wecklein's assumption that after δύναται' ἂν something like εὐρίσκειν πρόω, | ἐκείνους αἰὲν ὁδεῖν is needed. Headlam (C. R. xv 99 n.) favoured εὐτυχῶν, and so Blaydes (see cr. n.).—For ὦν ἐρᾷ τυχεῖν see on fr. 356.

9 ε. καὶ γὰρ δυσειδὲς κτέ. Observe that καὶ ('even') qualifies the following adjectives, although in such cases it is more usual for γὰρ to be postponed (καὶ δυσειδὲς γάρ). Cf. Trach. 92 καὶ γὰρ ὁσπέρω τό γ' εὖ | πράσσειν... κέρδος ἐμπολῆ, with Jebb's note. See also Kuehner-

Gerth II 338.—δυσώνυμον in this context has given rise to much suspicion: thus Meineke boldly substituted γῆρας νέον for γλώσση σοφόν, coll. Eur. fr. 575: Wecklein changed γλώσση το γνῶμην, with δυσειδῆ for δυσειδὲς; Blaydes read κἂνδρα δύστομον for καὶ δυσώνυμον; J. proposed καὶ δύσθρον στόμα, comparing Pind. P. 4. 63 δύσθρου φωνᾷς ('slow speech'—of Bārtos, the stammerer). But I am not convinced that δυσώνυμον is unintelligible, though it cannot mean, as Brunn suggested, grave loquentem. The description exactly fits the personality of Thersites, whom Sophocles may have had in mind: he too was 'hated for his tongue,' cf. Hom. B 222 τῷ δ' ἔρ' Ἀχαιοὶ | ἐκπάγλως κοτέοντο νεμέσσηθέν τ' ἐνὶ θυμῷ. On this view, γλώσση should be connected with δυσώνυμον, which is an epic word and is employed in the epic sense: T 571 ἦδε δὴ ἥως εἰσι δυσώνυμος ἦ μ' Ὀδυσῆος | οἴκον ἀποσχέσει—'that accursed day is at hand....' Note the chiasmus, by which εὐμορφόν relates to δυσειδὲς, and σοφόν to δυσώνυμον.

11 ε. κἂν νόσων ξυνουσίᾳ. See cr. n. There are several other conjectures (καὶ νοσείν Ellendt, ἀφαιρεῖν καὶ νόσων ξυνουσίας O. Hense, ἀμαυροῦν καὶ νόσων ξυνουσίαν Holzner, κἀνοσείν ἐξουσία Bergk, ἀνοσίτων οἱ κἀνόμων ἐξουσία F. W. Schmidt, εἰδὼ νόσους ἐξουσία Enger, καὶ νοσούσιν ἐξουσία Papabasilieus), but none so satisfactory as Meineke's, which J. and H. accepted. H. points out that the Greeks did not say ἐξουσία πάρεστι but merely πάρεστι οἱ ἐξέστι, or ἐξουσία (ἐστὶ): therefore ἐξουσία cannot stand. Moreover, the sense requires not χαίρειν καὶ νοσείν but χαίρειν καὶ νοσοῦντι, or, in a synonymous phrase, καὶ νόσῳ ξυνόντι: O. T. 303 οἷα νόσῳ σύνεστιν, Al. 338 τοῖς πάλαι νοσῆμασι ξυνούσι. Eur. fr. 1079 ταύτη τῇ νόσῳ ξυνών, Phil. 520 θανὼν δὲ πλησθῆς τῆς νόσου ξυνουσίᾳ. Wealth can be happy in spite of sickness because it can afford to pay physicians for a cure: Eur. El. 427 σκοπῶ τὰ χρήμαθ' ὡς ἔχει μέγα σθένος, ξένους τε δοῦναι σώμα τ' ἐν νόσους πρὸν δαπάναισι σώσαι. So in a Comparison of Wealth and Virtue (Stob. flor. 91. 33) Wealth ἐσμενόμετο χρεῖας ἀνθρώπων διορθοῦν, ... πρτερον μὲν εἰρήνῃ, πολέμοις δὲ παρέχειν, θεραπεύειν δ' ἐκ νόσων... νόσοι δ' ἐν ἀνθρώποις εἰσὶν, ἐφ' ᾧ πάντα δεῖ χρημάτων.—Wecklein's change of χαίρειν to χλῆν is unnecessary.

For the general sense H. quoted Menand. fr. 90 (III 28 K.) πλοῦτος δὲ πολλῶν ἐπικάλυμ' ἔστιν κακῶν, and fr. 485 (III 140 K.) τοῦτο μόνον ἐπισκοτεῖ | καὶ δυσγενεῖα καὶ τρόπον πονηρίᾳ, | καὶ πᾶσιν οἷς ἔσχηκεν ἄνθρωπος κακοῖς, | τὸ πολλὰ κεκτῆσθαι· τὰ δ' ἄλλ' ἐλέγχεται.

He also urged, as against Nauck's reading, that ἐπικρύπτεσθαι rather than ἀποκρύπτεσθαι is the vox propria in the sense of to cloak: but the inference is by no means certain. Cf. Eur. fr. 416 (Stob. flor. 4. 9) τῷ θρασεί τὰς συμφορὰς | ζητοῦσ' ἀμαυροῦν κάπικρύπτεσθαι (Trinc., κάποκ. M.A., Nauck) κακά. fr. 553 ἐκμαρτυρεῖν γὰρ ἄνδρα τὰς αὐτοῦ τύχας | εἰς πάντας ἀμαθές, τὸ δ' ἐπικρύπτεσθαι σοφόν. In fr. 460. 2 χρῆ περιστέλλαι καλῶς | κρύπτοντα καὶ μὴ πᾶσι κηρύσσειν τὰδε, the simple verb is found. Bruno Keil (Herm. XXIII 379) adduced Isocr. 1. 42 in support of Nauck's reading. For the moral precept which enjoined the concealment of misfortune see on frs. 83, 653.

89

νομάς δέ τις κερούσσω ἀπ' ὀρθίων πάγων καθεῖρπεν ἔλαφος

ἄρασα μύξας καὶ κερασφόρους
στόρθυγγας εἶρψ' ἔκηλος

89 Aelian nat. an. 7. 39 ὅσοι λέγουσι θήλειαν ἔλαφον κέρατα οὐ φέειν, οὐκ αἰδοῦνται τοὺς τοῦ ἐναντίου μάστιγας, Σοφοκλέα μὲν εἰπόντα 'νομάς... ἔλαφος' καὶ πάλιν 'ἄρασα... ἔκηλος,' καὶ ταῦτα μὲν ὁ τοῦ Σοφίλλου ἐν τοῖς Ἀλεξάνδρις. V. 1 is partly quoted by Etym. Gud. p. 317, 12 (Etym. Paris. p. 1444 E) and Zon. lex. 5. 2. κερβεῖς p. 1186 κερούσσα, οἶον 'νόμος δὲ τι κερούσσα' <Ἡρωδιανός> περὶ παθῶν, and referred to by Pollux 5. 76 τῶν δὲ ἐλάφων ἄκρωτος μὲν ἡ θήλεια, ὁ δὲ ἄρρην κερωφόρος, ... καὶ χρυσόκερως ὁ ὑπὸ Ἡρακλέους ἀλούς. καὶ Ἀνακρέων (fr. 51) μὲν σφέλλεται κερβεσσάν ἔλαφον προσειπών, καὶ Σοφοκλῆς κερούσσαν τὴν Τηλέφον τροφόν. V. 3 is referred to by Pollux 2. 72 παρὰ δὲ Σοφοκλεί καὶ μύξαι οἱ μυκτῆρες κέκληνται.

1 Aelian continues his evidence from the poets by citing Eur. fr. 857, fr. 740, Pind. Ol. 3. 29, Anacreon fr. 51 ἀγανὺς οἶά τε νεβρὸν νεοθελεία | γαλαθηνόν, ὅς τ' ἐν ὕλῃ κερούσσης | ὑπολειφθεῖς ὑπὸ μητρός ἐπτοθήθῃ. Add Simonid. fr. 30 θάνατον κερούσσα εὐρέμην ματεύων ἐλάφω, Eur. Her. 375 τὰν χρυσόκαρανον δόρκα. The zoologists and grammarians were eager to point out the blunder: Arist. h. a. 4. 11. 538^b 18, poet. 25. 1460^b 31 ἔλαττον γὰρ (sc. ἀμάρτημα) εἰ μὴ ᾗδει ὅτι ἔλαφος θήλεια κέρατα οὐκ ἔχει ἢ εἰ ἀμμήτως ἔγραψεν, schol. Pind. Ol. 3. 52 ἐπιμελῶς οἱ ποιηταὶ τὴν θήλειαν ἔλαφον κέρατα ἔχουσιν εἰσάγουσιν, καθάπερ καὶ τὴν θηλάουσαν τὸν Τηλέφον γράφουσι καὶ πλάττουσι. The mistake is generally accounted for by the consideration that legend loves the miraculous, and is not content to follow the prosaic limits of science; but Ridgeway in Early Age of Greece, 1 p. 360 ff., holds that the story of Heracles reflects a knowledge of the existence of the reindeer in northern Europe. In that case we must suppose other miraculous does were given antlers on the analogy of this famous quest.—νομάς: roaming. See Jebb on O. T. 1350.—ὀρθίων πάγων. Dindorf quotes Ant. 985 ὀρθόποδος ὑπὲρ πάγων.

2 Wagner suggested as a supplement Τηλέφου νέον τροφός.

3 μύξας=μυκτῆρας. Cf. Phot. lex. p. 280, 3 μύξαν· αὐτὸν τὸν μυκτῆρα καλοῦσιν, οὐχὶ τὸ ὕργον· οὕτως Ἀριστοφάνης (fr. 820, I 580 K.). Similarly Hesych. III p. 128.—Meineke, who would have preferred μυκτῆρε but for the evidence of Pollux, fills up the gap by reading μύξας <ἔψι>. Blaydes supplied δεῦρο.—κερασφόρους: observe the transference of the epithet, and see n. on fr. 11.

90

ἐφθυμνεῖς

90 Hesych. II p. 244 ἐφθυμνεῖς ἐπείδεις. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεάδαις.

ἐφθυμνεῖν is to chant over, and both it and ἐπείδω may be construed with acc. of the theme and dat. of the person affectcd. It is probable that the verb was used here with the same simple sense as in Aesch. Eum. 903 τί οὖν μ' ἀνωγας τῇδ' ἐφθυμνήσαι χθονί;

91

φρονεῖν

91 Erotian gloss. Hippocr. p. 84. 2 κατεφρόνεε κατενέει. φρονεῖν γὰρ ἔλεγον οἱ παλαιοὶ τὸ νοεῖν, ὥς καὶ Εὐριπίδης ἐν Ἀντιόπῃ (fr. 205) φάσκει· 'φρονῶ δ' ὁ πάσχω καὶ τόδ' οὐ μικρὸν κακόν.' μέμνηται καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἀλεάδαις (ἀχαιάδου codd.: corr. Schleusner) καὶ ἐν Ἀμφιαράῳ (fr. 119).

Similar statements are made by Etym. M. p. 800, 43 φρονεῖν σημαίνει καὶ τὸ νοεῖν and Hesych. IV p. 239. There are several such passages in Sophocles: Trach. 1145 φρονῶ δὲ ξυμφορὰς ἴν' ἔσταμεν, id. 289 φρόνει νῦν ὥς ἤζοντα, Ant. 49, 996, O.C. 872, and others. The examples are not well arranged in Ellendt.

ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΣ

Fr. 93 confirms the view generally held that the story of the play is to be found in Hygin. fab. 91, and is therefore similar to that of the Alexandros of Euripides, which was put on the stage with the Troades in 415 B.C. When Hecuba was pregnant with Paris, she dreamed that she gave birth to a flaming torch, from which a number of snakes crawled forth. The diviners held that the welfare of Troy depended on the destruction of the child to be born. Consequently, when Alexandros was born, he was sent away to be killed; but his guards pitied him and were content to expose him, with the result that he was discovered by some shepherds, who reared him as their own son, and called him by the name Paris. Paris grew to maturity among the herds on Mt Ida, and made a special favourite of one of the bulls. At length Priam determined to celebrate funeral games in honour of his child long since lost, and sent some of his servants to choose a bull as prize for the victor in one of the contests. The bull of Paris was selected, and he was so much distressed in consequence that he went down to the town, entered for the contest, and defeated all his opponents, including his own brothers. Deiphobus¹, in anger at the success of a clown, drew his sword upon him; but Paris took refuge at the altar of Ζεὺς ἑρκείος. Cassandra then declared that the new-comer was her brother, and Priam recognised his son (by means of certain *crepundia*¹, according to Serv. on Verg. Aen. 5. 370), and welcomed him to the palace. Of course there is nothing to connect Sophocles with any particular details in the above account; and we are not in a position to distinguish the treatment of Euripides from that of Sophocles.

¹ Or Hector, according to Servius.

Robert (Bild und Lied, pp. 233—239) undertook to show that the story concerning the dream of Hecuba and the exposure of Paris, his rescue and ultimate restoration to his home, was not, as Welcker believed (Ep. Cycl. II 90), contained in the Cypria, but was the invention of the fifth century, and in all probability of Sophocles in the Alexandros, in the composition of which he was largely influenced by the Herodotean account of the youth of Cyrus (I 108 ff.). He had an easy task in demolishing the argument by which Welcker attempted to establish the indispensability of the story to the narrative of the Cypria, viz. that the circumstances of the judgment of Paris presuppose his residence on Ida, and that this in its turn implies his escape from exposure; for his adoption of a pastoral life was in no way inconsistent with his recognition as one of the princely family of Priam. But there is a wide gap between the admission that the origin of the story cannot be traced to the Cypria and the conclusion that Sophocles was its author. Even if Robert is correct in his inference from Tro. 919 ff. and Androm. 293 ff. that in the latter passage Euripides followed an older and simpler version, according to which Hecuba refused to surrender Paris to death, notwithstanding the vaticinations of Cassandra—a conclusion which is by no means certain—it helps very little towards the result which Robert desired to establish. Moreover, the discovery of the fragments of Pindar's Paeans has destroyed the foundation of Robert's theory; for in 8. 27 ff. there is an unmistakable allusion to Hecuba's dream. But, apart from this, the onus of strictly proving their case lies on those who seek to show that any tragic plot was invented by its author; if even Euripides, so far as we can tell, never dared to do anything of the kind, we may be quite sure that Sophocles was far less likely to make the experiment.

It will be observed that Hyginus states that Alexandros was the name originally given to the child, and that Paris was substituted by the shepherds. The exact opposite is asserted by Eur. fr. 64: cf. Enn. trag. fr. 38, Ov. Her. 16. 358, and perhaps Eur. I.A. 1293 (Murray). Apollodorus (3. 150) says that the shepherds who originally found him called him Paris, and that his exploits subsequently earned for him the name of Alexandros. Are we to infer that Hyginus followed Sophocles rather than Euripides?

¹ The detail is suggestive of a tragic origin, and is referred by Ahrens to Euripides. On the other hand, there seems to be no reason for tracing to Sophocles the statement of Asclepiades (FHG III 303) that the slave who exposed Paris was called Archialos (Agelaus, according to Apollod. 3. 149).

92

οὐ γάρ τι θεσμὰ τοῖσιν ἀστίταις πρέπει

92 Steph. Byz. p. 139, 19 ἀστυ...ὁ πολίτης ἀστός καὶ ἀσθή, καὶ ἀστών. ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀστός τὸ ἀστίτης. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεξάνδρῳ 'οὐ γάρ...πρέπει' καὶ (fr. 93) 'βοτῆρα...γάρ;'

οὐ γάρ τι is a favourite combination in tragedy, with τι sometimes qualifying a single word, sometimes the whole clause. See on Eur. Hclid. 193, Phoen. 112. Its exact force cannot be determined here: cf. frs. 755, 856, Al. 1343, O.T. 433, Ant. 450. Wecklein's view that the line is interrogative is therefore improbable.—

ἀστίταις. The formation is analogous to χωρίτης (fr. 21), αὐλίτης (fr. 502), δκίτιτης (fr. 68). The history of these words is obscure. According to Kretschmer in KZ XXXI 343 the long ι is original (πολίτης: πόλι-ι) and is retained under the influence of the accent. (Cf. πρεσβύτης: πρεσβύ-ι.) Then ι passed to other stems. Besides δκίτιτης and ὀδίτης other examples are αὐτίτης, Αὐξίτης (Pausan. 8. 26. 1), ἀσπιδίτης, ἀντρίτης, ποιμνίτης, ὀρίτης, ἐδρίτης, ἐσπερίτης, δερδρίτης.

93

βοτῆρα νικᾶν ἄνδρας ἀστίτας. τί γάρ;

93 Quoted by Steph. Byz.: see on fr. 92.

The syntax is ambiguous, but the order of the words makes the meaning absolutely clear: the emphatic word is, as usual, put first. 'A herdsman the winner—against townsmen too!' Cf. Aesch. Cho. 885 τὸν ζῶντα καίγειν τοῖς τεθνηκότας λέγω. H. remarks that Tr. fr. adesp. 188 ὦ Ζεῦ, γένοιτο καταβαλεῖν τὸν σὺν ἐμῇ was quoted by grammarians as an example of ambiguity; and adds that, if Zeus really mistook the meaning, he must have been very imperfectly acquainted with Greek usage.—βοτῆρα is Paris, who was habitually called βοῖτης or βουκόλος; see Headlam on Aesch. Ag. 718 ff. For the story see the Introductory Note.—

ἄνδρας ἀστίτας. The addition of ἄνδρας here is probably complimentary, although it might be the reverse, emphasizing, as it does, either praise or blame. It is depreciatory in O.T. 1118 ὡς νομεῖς ἄνθρωποι, and in Ant. 690 ἀνδρὶ δημότῃ. See Neil on Ar. Eg. 259, Starkie on Ar. Vesp. 269, Ach. 168. Examples are collected by Blaydes on Ar. Lys. 368.—τί γάρ; when used in a continuous speech, challenges contradiction. 'What else?' 'What then?' So in Aesch. Ag. 1134 οὐδὲν ποτ' εἰ μὴ ξυνθανομένην. τί γάρ; ib. 1238, Cho. 879. In answers it becomes virtually a formula of assent: see e.g. Plat. Theaet. 209 B. The words are obviously appropriate to the circumstances of Paris's victory in the ἀγών.

94

στείχων δ' ἀγρώστην ὄχλον

94 Schol. A Hom. E 158 τὸ δὲ παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἀλεξάνδρῳ 'στείχων δ' ἀγρώστην ὄχλον' παρώνυμον. Thesame is found in Eustath. II. p. 533, 40, who omits δ' after στείχων and gives Ἀλεξάνδρα for Ἀλεξάνδρῳ. The word ἀγρώστης is introduced as analogous to the Homeric χηρώστης.

There is nothing to indicate that ὄχλον is related to στείχων as the goal of its action; 'approaching the rustic crowd.' But the construction is quite possible, although less common than when the acc. is a place-name: cf. O. T. 713 ὡς αὐτὸν ἦξοι μοῖρα πρὸς παιδὸς θανείν. Jebb on Phil. 141, fr. 314, 238, Eur. Phoen. 977 (n.), Hipp. 1371, Bacch. 848, Pind. Isth. 2. 48. There is in any case no need to alter the text (στείχοντ' Nauck formerly, στέργω δ' F. W. Schmidt). Mekler would complete the line with εὐρήσεις μέγαν or the like.

ἀγρώστης beside ἀγρότης and ἀγρώτης, shows a non-essential σ which comes by analogy from the verbal class. Wecklein (on Eur. Rhés. 287, Her. 377) wishes to restore ἀγρώτης everywhere in tragedy, and Murray adopts ἀγρώταις as better attested in Rhés. 266. In Bacch. 564 ἀγρώταις is read by all. There seems no reason to doubt that both forms existed, but it is difficult to choose between them when the copies differ. Hesych. I p. 31 has ἀγρώταις ἐργάται, θηρευταί, where the second interpretation suggests a derivation from ἀγρώσσω; and this is the meaning in Apoll. Rhod. 4. 175. In tragedy however the word always means 'countryman.' See also on fr. 314, 33.

95

ἀμαλθεύειν

95 Phot. ed. Reitz. p 86, 9 ἀμαλθεύειν...τρέφειν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεξάνδρῳ. ἔνθεν καὶ ἡ Ἀμάλθεια.

The existence of ἀμαλθεύειν was previously known only from Hesych. I p. 137 ἀμαλθεύειν πληθύνει, πλουτίζει. ἡ τρέφει. Etym. M. p. 76, 38 ἀμαλθεύσει πληθεῖ αὐτῇ. The authority of the word is considerably strengthened by the new evidence; and there is no longer any probability in Gruppe's suggestion (p. 341) that it was formed from the name Amalthea. Rather we should suppose that the noun and verb existed side by side, and that the idea of abundance or plenty was personified or deified in the various forms familiar to Greek legend. It should be observed that the earliest allusions to Amalthea (Pind. in schol. Hom. Φ 194, Pherecydes fr. 37, FHG I 82) represent her as a nymph in whose possession was the horn of plenty, and that the Cretan legend of the goat Amalthea which suckled Zeus is attested only by later writers. That is to say, the name Amalthea appears at a comparatively late date to have been transferred to the nameless Αἰξ οὐραία (Zenob. I. 26, 2. 48). Further, the fact that κέρας ἀμαλθείας was an attribute of various deities (Wernicke in Pauly-Wissowa I 1721) indicates that Amalthea was not a distinctively conceived personality. The etymology of Amalthea is uncertain, and the suggestions which have been put forward (collected by Gruppe, p. 8249) are not satisfactory. But the meaning points to a connexion with ἀμαλός and ἀμάλη (= ἡ τριχῶν ἀθήσις Etym. M.).

96

δύσαυλος

96 Hesych. I p. 542 δύσαυλος δυσάλιστος. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεξάνδρῳ (ἀλεξάνδ^δ cod.).

Cf. An. 359 δυσάυλων πάγων ἐναίθρεια καὶ δύσομβρα φεύγειν βέλην, where the schol.'s note is δυσχερῆ τὸν ἐπανλισμὸν ποιοῦντων. Aesch. Ag. 560 μόχθους γὰρ εἰ λέγομι καὶ δυσάυλλας. The reference is perhaps to the shepherds' life on Mt Ida.

97

Ἐφέσεια

97 Steph. Byz. p. 189, 19 Ἐφεσος... τὸ ἔθνικόν Ἐφέσιος. εὐρηται καὶ Ἐφέσεια διὰ διφθόγγου· οὕτω γὰρ ἐν Ἀλεξάνδρῳ Σοφοκλῆς.

The form Ἐφέσιος is also found occasionally on inscriptions: see e.g. Hicks, Manual 151, 10 ἀναγγεῖλαι τοῖς Ἐφεσίοις, CIG II 2228 Ἀρτέμιδι Ἐφεσεῖη, ib. 3345 Ἐφέσειος. Cf. Βοσπόρειος in fr. 707.

But why did Stephanus record the neut. plural, if it was used merely as an adjective? Did Sophocles by an anachronism refer to the Pan-Ionic festival of the Ephesia (Thuc. 3. 104)? An allusion to the magic letters is unlikely.

98

θηλάστρια

98 Hesych. II p. 314 θηλάστρια· τροφός. ἔστι δὲ Ἰακόν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεξάνδρῳ.

θηλάστρια. For the formation of these feminine nominia agentis see Brugmann, Comp. Gr. II p. 336 E. 11. θηλάστρια is formed from θηλάζω, and may be compared with εὐνήστρια (beside εὐνήστειρα for εὐνήστειρα) and αὐλήστρια. The word is quoted from the comic poets, and is certainly not exclusively Ionic in usage. It appears however that in the κοινή the verb θηλάζω came to mean to suck, although in classical Greek it was regularly applied to the mother. This fact is noticed in Suidas and Photius, for whose readers the ancient usage required explanation. Hence Photius (p. 90, 24) explains θηλάστριαν by ἣν θηλάσεται τῇς from the point of view of his own age, and his gloss on θηλάζειν sufficiently accounts for Hesychius calling θηλάστρια an Ionism: τὸ τρέφειν τῷ γάλακτι οἱ ἀρχαῖοι πάντες· οὕτως μάλιστα οἱ Ἴωνες.

Ahrens suggested that the word was an epithet of the she-bear which suckled Paris.

99 μαιεύτριαν

99 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 108, 31 μαιεύτριαν ἀντὶ τοῦ μαῖαν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεξάνδρῳ.

The meaning is that Soph. used μαιεύτριαν as = nurse, although Photius (lex.

p. 241, 9) shows that the Attic use of μαῖα for a midwife was well known to the grammarians. For the formation see on fr. 98.

100

μνείαν

100 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 107, 25 μνείαν τὴν μνήμην. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεξάνδρῳ. The same gloss is assigned to Sophocles by Phot. lex. p. 272, 17 and Suid. s.v., but without the name of a play.

The word is by no means uncommon, and there is no ground for Nauck's suggestion that Ἀλεξάνδρῳ is a corruption for Ἠλέκτρῳ, i.e. with a reference to El. 392 βίου δὲ τοῦ παρόντος οὐ μνείαν ἔχεις.

ΑΛΗΤΗΣ

The title is only quoted by Stobaeus (floril.), and by him always as 'Αλείτης. A tragedy with the title 'Αλήτης is attributed to Lycophron by Suidas s.v.

It is generally agreed that the title-rôle belongs to Aletes, the son of Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra, and that Welcker (p. 215) was right in finding the substance of the plot in Hygin. fab. 122. The story there related is as follows. Electra received a false message that Orestes and Pylades had been sacrificed to Artemis at Tauri. Aletes, the son of Aegisthus, on learning that no survivor of the race of the Atridae was left, usurped the sovereignty at Mycenae. Electra set out to Delphi to enquire of the oracle concerning her brother's death. On the same day that she reached her destination, Iphigenia and Orestes also happened to arrive; and the same messenger who had brought the news about Orestes pointed out Iphigenia as his murderess. Hearing this, Electra snatched a blazing brand from the altar, and in her ignorance would have blinded Iphigenia, but for the timely interference of Orestes. A recognition followed, and they returned together to Mycenae. Here Orestes killed Aletes, and would also have slain his sister Erigone, had not Artemis carried her away and made her a priestess in Attica. Orestes then married Hermione, and Pylades Electra.

Welcker conjectured that fr. 646 belongs here, thinking that Tyndareus appeared as the guardian of Aletes, and held that frs. 104, 105 are part of a dialogue between Aletes and Orestes.

Ribbeck (Röm. Trag. p. 469) finds the same plot in the Agamemnonidae of Accius. Whereas Welcker saw in Hyginus sufficient material for two tragedies, Ribbeck preserved the unity of place by supposing that Aletes and Erigone went to Delphi in furtherance of a plot against Orestes and Iphigenia. Comparing frs. 101—103 with Agamemnonidae fr. II he thinks that Aletes was represented as a hypocritical and specious talker. Fr. 107 suits the circumstances of Agamemnon's and Aegisthus' children.

For the proposed identification with the Erigone see p. 173. Hense has recently revived a suggestion originally made by Bergk that the Aletes was a late play. He is thus able to account for the Euripidean tone of fr. 107. He points out that εἰς ἑλεγχον ἵέναι (fr. 105) is used by Sophocles only in the Philoctetes and Oedipus Coloneus, and that fr. 104 echoes O.C. 75.

101

ψυχὴ γὰρ εὖνους καὶ φρονουῦσα τοῦνδικον κρείσσων σοφιστοῦ παντός ἐστιν εὐρετής.

101. 2 κρείττων A | εὐρετής M

101 Stob. flor. 3. 8 (III p. 194, 1 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεΐτη. 'ψυχὴ...εὐρετής.' The extract is not in S.

'A loving heart and an honest purpose will learn the truth sooner than any adept.' Ellendt thinks that παντός is neuter and dependent on εὐρετής; but the meaning is the same in either case, and it seems unnatural to sever σοφιστοῦ παντός. The rhythm is the same as in El. 76.—σοφιστής has no exact English equivalent. The gloss πᾶς τεχνίτης (Phot. lex. p. 528, 25) gives the best general interpretation; but the remark of the same lexicographer τὸ δὲ παλαιὸν σοφιστὴς ὁ σοφὸς ἐκαλεῖτο, which L. and S. have adopted without sufficient restriction, must be understood to apply to trained intellect as distinguished from natural ability. At an early stage of civilization the attainment of a high degree of such general culture as the times admit wears the aspect of a specialized branch of learning: it is from this point of view that Thales and the rest (συνετοὶ τινες καὶ νομοθετικοὶ Diog. L. 1. 40) were called σοφισταί (Hdt. 1. 29)—'Wise Men' rather than 'wise men.' With the present passage cf. Eur. fr. 905 μισῶ σοφιστήν, ὅστις οὐχ αὐτῷ σοφός.

The thought that character is more effective than wisdom may be illustrated by Menand. fr. 472, 7 III 135 K. τρόπος ἐστ' ὁ πείθων τοῦ λέγοντος, οὐ λόγος. Cf. Plut. Phoc. 5: Demosthenes called Phocion the κοπὴς of his speeches. ἀλλὰ τοῦτο μὲν ἴσως πρὸς τὸ ἥθος ἀνοιστέον· ἐπεὶ καὶ ῥῆμα καὶ νῆμα μόνον ἀνδρὸς ἀγαθοῦ μυρίοις ἐνθυμήμασι καὶ περιόδοις ἀντίρροπον ἔχει πίστιν, Demosth. 10, Stob. flor. 37. 34. It may be added that the parliamentary influence ascribed to the late Duke of Devonshire was of a similar character.

εὐρετής. The accentuation is disputed: see Chandler, § 38, who decides in favour of εὐρέτης because of the acc. εὐρέτην in Diod. 1. 25.

102

βραχεὶ λόγῳ δὲ πολλὰ πρόσκειται σοφά.

102 δὲ πολλὰ SM: καὶ πολλὰ A

102 Stob. flor. 35. 4 (III p. 688, 8 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεΐτη (so M.A. S omits the name of the play). 'βραχεὶ...σοφά.'

Cf. Eur. fr. 28 σοφοῦ πρὸς ἀνδρὸς δατις ἐν βραχεὶ | πολλοὺς καλῶς οἷός τε συντέμνειν λόγους, and Polonius' 'Since brevity is the soul of wit' (Hamlet. ii. 2. 90).

πολλὰ...σοφά, as πολλὰ καλὰ (fr. 81), πολλὰ σοφά (Eur. Suppl. 903, Tr. fr. adesp. 509). But πολλὰ...χρηστά θ' occurs in Phil. 583, where see Jebb.—πρόσκειται is sometimes merely a synonym of πρόσ-εστι, belongs to; and so is applied to permanent qualities. The nearest parallel in Soph. is Ant. 1243 τὴν ἀθανάτιαν | δὲ μὲν ἄνδρὶ πρόσκειται κακόν. Cf. Eur. Hipp. 970 τὸ δ' ἄρσεν αὐτοῦς ὠφελεὶ προσκείμενον, Rhes. 266 ἢ πόλλ' ἀγρόταις σκαὶ πρόσκειται φρενί, id. 107 ἄλλω δ' ἄλλο πρόσκειται γέρας, | σὲ μὲν μάχεσθαι, τοὺς δὲ βουλευέων καλῶς. This usage is not noticed in L. and S. (H.)

In Mélanges Gr. Rom. vi 150 Nauck proposed βραχεὶ δὲ μύθῳ, but the postponement of δὲ is normal (Eur. Helid. 39 n.).

103

ἀνὴρ γὰρ ὅστις ἤδεται λέγων αἰεί, λέλθθεν αὐτὸν τοῖς ξυνοῦσιν ὦν βαρύς.

103. 1 γὰρ SM: δ' A | λέγειν S

103 Stob. flor. 36. 16 (III p. 694, 6 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς 'Αλείτη, 'ἀνὴρ...βαρύς.'

1 See cr. n. Although δέ is constantly corrupted to γάρ, the converse case rarely occurs: see Porson on Eur. Med. 1083 (1087).

2 λέλθθεν αὐτὸν...ὦν. In this idiom the partic. is always nom., never acc.: contrast ξύναϊδα ἐμᾶντῳ, after which either the nom. or dat. participle is legitimate, and see Kuehner-Gerth II 50.—βαρύς, tiresome. So Eur. Suppl. 894 οὐδ' ἐξεκιστῆς τῶν λόγων, ὅθεν βαρύς | μάλιστα' ἂν ἐλθ' ἀνθρώπου τε καὶ ξένου, Plat. Theaet. 210 C εἰάν τε κενὸς ᾖς, ἥττον ἔσει βαρύς τοῖς συνοῦσι καὶ ἡμερώτερος.

H. rendered:—'The man that will be talking still forgets | That he is tedious to his company.'

104

ἀλλ' εἴπερ εἰ γενναῖος, ὥς αὐτὸς λέγεις, σήμαιν' ὅτου τ' εἰ χῳπόθεν· τὸ γὰρ καλῶς πεφυκὸς οὐδεὶς ἂν μιάνειεν λόγος.

104. 2 εἰ ὁπόθεν SMA, εἰ χ' ὁπόθεν B, εἰ καὶ πόθεν Gesner

104 Stob. flor. 88. 11 (IV p. 722, 1 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς 'Αλείτη. 'ἀλλ'...λόγος.'

'If you really are noble, as you say, declare your parentage and your home: for good birth will not be shamed in the telling.' There can be no reason for a noble to conceal his identity,—rather the contrary: cf. Arist. fr. 91 Rose εὐγενείας μὲν οὖν φησὶν (sc. Lycophron) ἀφανὲς τὸ κάλλος, ἐν λόγῳ δὲ τὸ σεμνόν. The meaning is quite simple, and there is no need for R. Enger's conjecture λόγῳ in v. 3, still less for Wagner's ψόγος or Holzner's πότμος. The fragment is supposed to come from a dialogue between Aletes and Orestes: see Introductory Note.

1 εἴπερ. The force of this conjunction has been exhaustively examined by E. S.

Thompson on Plato Meno, p. 258 ff. He shows that si modo (fr. 86 n.) is the principal, but not the only meaning, and that there are many instances in which (as here) εἴπερ assumes the truth of the supposition it introduces. For the present passage cf. Ai. 547 εἴπερ δικαίως ἐστ' ἐμὸς τὰ πατρώθεν, Plat. Lach. 197 C φημί γάρ σε εἶναι σοφόν, καὶ Λάμαχόν γε, εἴπερ ἔστε ἀνδρεῖοι. Ellendt erroneously gives siquidem as the equivalent of εἴπερ everywhere in Sophocles; but the examples readily refute him.

2 εἰ ὅτου τ' εἰ χῳπόθεν: the usual questions put to a stranger after Hom. α 170. Cf. Phil. 56, Eur. Hel. 83, Phoen. 123, El. 779, Ion 258.—καλῶς πεφυκός: cf. El. 989 σὴν αἰσχρὸν αἰσχροῦς τοῖς καλῶς πεφυκῶσιν.

105

ἀλλ' ἀξίως ἤλεγξας οὐδ' ἡμῖν πικρῶς γένος γὰρ εἰς ἔλεγχον ἐξιὼν καλὸν εὐκλειαν ἂν κτήσαιοτο μᾶλλον ἢ ψόγον.

105. 1 ἤλεγξας Bergk: ἐλεξας codd. | οὐδ' ἡμῖν Hartung: οὐδὲ (οὐδὲν A) μὲν SMA, οὐδ' ἐμοὶ Porson, οὐδὲ μὴν Brunn, οὐδ' ἄγαν Blaydes

105 Stob. flor. 89. 8 (iv p. 728, 1 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλεῖτης. 'ἀλλ'...ψόγον.'

It has been often remarked that these verses appear to be a reply to the previous fragment. This consideration recommends the substitution of ἤλεγξας for ἐλεξας in v. 1 ('thy questions are justified'); the change is a small one, and the improvement substantial. The correction, which occurred to me independently, was made long ago by Bergk, but has been neglected by recent critics.—Hartung is entitled to the credit of οὐδ' ἡμῖν (see cr. n.), which was independently suggested by Nauck. Tucker proposed οὐδὲν ἐμπικρῶν, but this is less good, apart from the novelty of the form.

2 εἰς ἔλεγχον ἐξιὼν, 'when it comes to meet the test': Eur. Alc. 640 ἐδειξας εἰς ἔλεγχον ἐξελθὼν δὲ εἰ, Plat. Phaedr. 278 c εἰς ἔλεγχον ἴων περὶ ὧν ἔγραψε. So in Eur. Hipp. 1310 εἰς ἔλεγχον πεσεῖν is 'to be discovered.' But the phrase may equally well signify, 'coming to apply the test,' as in Phil. 98 νῦν δ' εἰς ἔλεγχον ἐξιὼν ὁρῶ κτέ. And in Eur. Her. 73 οὐ δ' εἰς ἔλεγχον ἄλλος ἀλλοθεν πίπνων is 'one after another questioning me.' Cf. Philem. fr. 93, 3, 11 507 K. The object to be tested, if expressed, is put in the genitive: O. C. 1297 οὐτ' εἰς ἔλεγχον χειρὸς οὐδ' ἔργον μολῶν. Herwerden conj. γένους...ἐξιὼν...κτῆσαιτο, but this leaves καλὸν unexplained (καλοῦ Blaydes). The strong compound ἐξελέγχω, often 'to lay bare another's weakness,' occurs in a similar context: Eur. El. 35 (ἡμῖν) πατέρων μὲν Μυκηναίων ἀπο | γεγῶσι· οὐ δὲ τοῦτο γ' ἐξελέγχομαι, where see Keene's note.—καλόν, which is used as e.g. in Eur. Hipp. 634 κηδεύσας καλοῦς | γαμβροῖσι χαίρων σφίεται πικρὸν λέχος, must be joined with γένος. Blaydes's conjecture λόγων is unnecessary. Hense thinks that καλόν was substituted by the anthologist for τὸ σόν.

3 κτήσαιοτο is like ἀστεργῇ θεᾷς | ἐκ-τήσαιτ' ὀργήν Ai. 776.

106

τίς ἂν ποτ' ὄλβον οὐ μέγαν θείῃ βροτῶν ἢ σμικρὸν ἢ τῶν μηδαμοῦ τιμωμένων ;
οὐ γάρ ποτ' αὐτῶν οὐδὲν ἐν ταύτῳ μένει.

106. 1 ἂν Meineke: δὴ codd. | οὐ scripsi: ἢ codd. | βροτῶν A: βροτοῦ SM 2 ἢ τῶν...τιμωμένων Cobet: ἢ τὸν...τιμώμενον codd., ἦτοι...τιμώμενον Heath

106 Stob. flor. 105. 42 (iv p. 940, 2 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀλεῖτης ('Αλεῖτης om. S). 'τίς...μένει.'

J., who retained ἢ in v. 1 and accepted μέγ' ἂν, a proposal of Cobet, for μέγαν interpreted as follows: 'Who would count the prosperity of men as a great thing, or as a trifle, or as a thing to be utterly despised? For good and bad fortune are continually succeeding each other. We can never regard it as a permanent good, nor, again, as something so transitory as to be trifling; nor, lastly, can we leave it altogether out of account.' Such was also substantially the view of Gomperz (Bruchstücke, p. 12), but I am unable to accept it. For, if prosperity is neither great nor small nor of no account, how are we to regard it? And in what way does the instability of human affairs establish this negative result? H. was thoroughly dissatisfied with the text, and suggested tentatively in the second line ἡ συμκρόν; ἢ τῶν κτέ., οἱ ἐστὼ... τιμώμενον, οἱ ἢ <οὐ> τῶν... τιμωμένων; Blaydes makes several guesses, none of which has any probability. I believe that Cobet's attractive μέγ' ἄν has led to a darkening of counsel, and that what Sophocles really affirmed was that great prosperity is of little or no account because of its instability. This meaning is obtained by substituting οὐ for the first ἢ with Meineke's ἄν for δὴ and Cobet's alteration in v. 2. The sentiment is then exactly the same as that of fr. 593 οὐ χρὴ ποτ' ἀνθρώπων μέγαν δλβον ἀπο- | βλέπει· τανυφλοῖον γὰρ ἰσαμέριος | <φύλλοισιν> αἰγείρου βιστὴν ἀποβάλλει. Cf. fr. 646, [Isocr.] I. 42 νόμιζε μηδὲν εἶναι τῶν ἀνθρώπων βέβαιον· οὕτω γὰρ οὐτ' εὐτυχῶν ἔσει περιχαρὴς οὐτε δυστυχῶν περίλυπος. In the same connexion H. refers to Eur. fr. 618 τὸν δλβον οὐδὲν οὐδαμοῦ κρίνω βροτοῖς, | ὅν γ' ἐξαλείφει ῥᾶν ἢ γραφὴν θεός, fr. 1041, Aesch. Ag. 1326. Although everything mundane is fleeting, a peculiar degree of insecurity was proverbially ascribed to Wealth: cf. Eur. Hel. 905, Phoen. 558 and a full list of illustrations collected by Headlam in Journ. Phil. xxiii 276 f. For the confusion of ΔΝ and ΔΗ see H. Richards in C. R. vi 338, Bywater in J. P. xxxii 225. It should be mentioned that Cobet, Nov. Lect. p. 501, while contending that δὴ has frequently been altered by scribes to ἄν, adds 'etiam contra peccatur sed rarissime.'—For θέλη... συμκρόν, 'regard as trifling,' cf. El. 1270 δαμόνιον αὐτὸ τίτημ' ἐγώ. For the partitive gen. forming the predicate J. quotes Plat. rep. 424 C ἐμέ... δὲ τῶν πεπεισμένων, id. 437 B πάντα τὰ ταυῦτα τῶν ἐναντίων ἀλλήλοις θέλης (ἄν).—μηδαμοῦ is not 'nowhere honoured,' but a genitive of price: 'held in no esteem,' 'valued at nil.' H. quotes Eur. fr. 360, 49 Παλλὰς δ' οὐδαμοῦ τιμῆσεται, O. T. 908 οὐδαμοῦ τιμαῖς Ἀπόλλων ἐμφανής, Aesch. Eum. 627 μητρός μηδαμοῦ τιμᾶς νέμειν, Menand. fr. 405 iii 118 K. τῆς μερίδος ὧν τῆς οὐδαμοῦ τεταγμένης. So οὐδαμοῦ λέγειν (Ant. 184), νομίζειν (Aesch. Pers. 498, Eum. 426, Ar. Nub. 1421). See also on Eur. Phoen. 1464 οὐδαμοῦ νίκη πέλοι.—In regard to Heath's ἦτοι J. observes that ἦ... ἦτοι is not found in tragedy (Lobeck on Ai. 177), though it occurs in Hom. τ 599, Pind. Nem. 6. 4 f. On the other hand ἦτοι... ἦ is not uncommon: e.g. Ant. 1182, Trach. 150. Blaydes proposed ἦ καὶ... τιμώμενον.

3 αὐτῶν cannot refer to βροτῶν but is used vaguely in reference to δλβον, as if it were τῶν τοιούτων. So often in Thucydides: e.g. 2. 43 τὴν τῆς πόλεως δύναμιν... ἐνθυμουμένους ὅτι τολμῶντες καὶ γιγνώσκοντες τὰ δέοντα καὶ ἐν τοῖς ἔργοις αἰσχυρόμενοι ἄνδρες αὐτὰ ἐκτέλεσαν, 6. 10 σκοπδαὶ ἔσονται· οὕτω γὰρ... ἄνδρες ἐπραξαν αὐτά. For the tendency to pluralize see Shilleto on Thuc. 1. 7. For similar instances see Adam on Plat. Crit. 44 c, Starkie on Ar. Ach. 438, and Roberts on Dion. Hal. de comp. verb. 14 p. 141.—οὐδὲν ἐν ταύτῳ μέναι: Nauck refers to Eur. Ion 969 τὰ θνητὰ τοιαῦθ'· οὐδὲν ἐν ταύτῳ μένει. The phrase ἐν τ. μ. occurs also in Eur. Tro. 350, Hel. 1026, fr. 201.

107

δεινὸν γε τοὺς μὲν δυσσεβεῖς κακῶν ἅπο βλαστῶντας εἶτα τοῦσδε μὲν πράσσειν καλῶς,

107. 1 δεινὸν γε Gesner: δεινὸν S, δεινὸν μὲν MA, δεινὸν δὲ B | post κακῶν Bergk r' inseruit 2 βλαστῶντας M

107 Stob. flor. 106. 11 (IV p. 951, 12 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἀλκυον. 'δεινὸν... γεγώς.'

It has been conjectured by F. W. Schmidt that this fragment has been wrongly attributed to Sophocles, and that it really belongs to Euripides. The moralizing tone is certainly suggestive of the latter, but the thought itself was a commonplace, and might as well have proceeded from Sophocles as from Euripides. Theognis had dwelt at length on the injustice of the divine government: see vv. 373—386, 731—752. Cf. Eur. fr. 293. There is nothing in the language which points decisively one way or the other, and the indications, such as they are, are perhaps slightly in favour of τοὺς δ' ὄντας ἐσθλοὺς ἔκ τε γενναίων ἅμα γεγῶτας εἶτα δυστυχεῖς πεφυκέναι.

 οὐ χρὴν τὰδ' οὕτω δαίμονας θνητῶν πέρι 5 πράσσειν· ἐχρὴν γὰρ τοὺς μὲν εὖσεβεις βροτῶν ἔχειν τι κέρδος ἐμφανὲς θεῶν πάρα, τοὺς δ' ὄντας ἀδίκους τοῖσδε τὴν ἐναντίαν δίκην κακῶν τιμωρὸν ἐμφανῇ τίνειν.
 κούδεις ἂν οὕτως ἠτύχει κακὸς γεγώς. 10

δ χρὴν S: χρῆ M, χρῆ A 6 τάσσειν Gomperz 8 τοῖσδε A: τοῖσδε S, τοὺς δὲ M | τὴν ἐπαΐαν Herwerden 10 ἠτύχει Heath: εὐτύχει Trinc., εὐτυχῆ S, εὐτυχῆ A, εὐτυχῆ A

Sophocles. See also Introductory Note.

1 f. δεινόν γε. It is highly probable that this is the opening line of a speech, and that γε has its usual connective force: 'Ah! it is sad....' See Neil on Ar. Eq., p. 188 and cf. El. 341 δεινόν γε σ' οὖσαν πατρός οὐ σὺ παῖς ἔφυς | κείνου λελῆσθαι, Ar. Ac. 1269 δεινόν γε τὸν κήρυκα τὸν παρὰ τοὺς βροτοὺς | οἰχόμενον εἰ μηδέποτε νοστήσει πάλιν. Sometimes the effect of γε is to throw a stronger emphasis on the adjective than in the instances just cited: see Jebb on Phil. 1225.—The addition of τ' (see cr. n.) after κακῶν has met with general approval, but I believe it can be shown to be unnecessary, if not actually harmful. Presumably those who accept τ' regard δυσσεβεῖς and κακῶν ἀπο βλαστόντας as co-ordinate, and the whole phrase as controlled by the articular τοὺς. But the consequence, though this has not been observed, is to make εἶτα solecistic; for, though Sophocles frequently employs εἶτα with resumptive force after a participle (v. Ellendt scv), he could not do so where the participle is attributive and not circumstantial. The fact is that τοὺς μὲν should be taken alone, = some (τοὺς δ' = others; and δυσσεβεῖς coalesces with βλαστόντας as part of the predicate. Cf. El. 440, 1081, where βλαστάνω is little more than a copula. It is stronger here and in the precisely parallel Al. 1304 ἀριστος ἐξ ἀρστέων δυνὼν βλαστῶν, i.e. 'born as the impious children of wicked parents.' Of course even so the connective particle might have been used, as in El. 590

εὖσεβεις καὶ εὖσεβῶν βλαστόντας, but it is unnecessary to introduce it.—τοῖσδε resumes τοὺς μὲν with a certain rhetorical impressiveness. Cf. Trach. 819 τὴν δὲ τέρψιν ἦν | τὸ μὲν δίδωσι πατρὶ, τὴν δ' αὐτῇ λάβοι and Tr. fr. adesp. 78. The examples with νῦν and αὐτοῖς (O. T. 248, 270, Trach. 287) are less emphatic. See also n. on Eur. Phoen. 498, Kuehner-Gerth I 660, Maetzner on Lycurg. 27.

3 ἅμα is suspected by Nauck, but I can see no more objection to it here than e.g. in Al. 1008 σὸς πατὴρ ἐμός θ' ἅμα.—ἐκ is used indifferently with ἀπο in v. 1. For the ordinary distinction see Jebb on Ani. 192.

6 πράσσειν (see cr. n.) is used of divine action in El. 200 εἰτ' οὖν θεὸς εἰτε βροτῶν | ἦν ὁ ταῦτα πράσσειν and in Trach. 1267 μεγάλην δὲ θεοῖς ἀγνωμοσύνην | εἰδότες ἔργων τῶν πρασσομένων. Its occurrence in another sense above is not a serious objection.—ἐχρὴν: the augmented form occurs only here in Sophocles: see Jebb on Phil. 1061.

7 ἐμφανὲς: a favourite word in Sophocles, who uses it 14 times as against 8 occurrences in Euripides.

8 τοῖσδε. I have accepted this reading with Dindorf. Nauck adopts τούσδε and inclines towards Herwerden's ἐπαΐαν (see cr. n.).

9 δίκην κακῶν τιμωρὸν. The adj. is generally applied to persons, but is an epithet of δίκη in Eur. El. 676 δὸς δὴ τὰ πατρὸς τοῖσδε τιμωρὸν δίκην, as well as in Plat. legg. 716 A, 872 E.

ΑΛΚΜΕΩΝ

There is no doubt that the correct form of the name in classical times was 'Αλκμέων rather than 'Αλκμαίων, as can be proved from the inscriptions both on stone and on vases: see the evidence quoted by Meisterhans³ p. 35.

Alcmaeon was one of the stock heroes of tragedy (Arist. poet. 13. 1453^a 20), and is represented as the typical madman: cf. Timocles fr. 6 (II 453 K.), 8 τοὺς γὰρ τραγῳδοὺς πρῶτον, εἰ βούλει, σκόπει | ὥς ὠφελοῦσι πάντας... ὁ νοσῶν δὲ μανικῶς 'Αλκμέων' ἐσκέψατο. There are two considerations which enable us to narrow the enquiry relating to the contents of the plot: (1) the fact that Sophocles also wrote plays¹ entitled 'Ἐπίγονοι and 'Εριφύλη; (2) fr. 108 shows that Alcmaeon had not yet recovered his reason. We may safely infer that the events on which the play is based were subsequent to the death of Eriphyle, while her son was still pursued by the Erinyes of his mother, and before he was finally released from suffering. Welcker (p. 279), who with high probability refers fr. 880 to the prologue of this play, builds on it a reconstructed plot with greater confidence than the facts warrant. Nevertheless, if we examine the legends with which Alcmaeon is connected, and exclude for the reason already given his revenge on his mother for his father's death, and his share in the expedition of the Epigoni, as well as the Corinthian episode dramatized by Euripides in his 'Αλκμέων διὰ Κορίνθου (TGF p. 379) as being entirely disconnected from the healing of the hero's madness, we are forced to conclude that Sophocles must have utilized either the adventures at Psophis or those in Acarnania². If we admit the relevance of fr. 880, only one answer is possible; but, even apart from that, there can be but little doubt as to the higher dramatic value of the Psophis-story, which Euripides also treated. It is conjectured but not proved that it was contained in the epic Thebais, or rather in the Epigoni, which is now regarded not so much as a separate poem as a subdivision of the Thebais (Bethe, Theb. Heldenlieder, p. 137). Our principal sources of information are Pausan. 8. 24. 8 ff. and Apollod. 3. 87 ff.³. From them we learn that

¹ Or a play entitled Epigoni containing the story of Eriphyle: see Introd. to Epigoni, p. 129.

² So also Ribbeck, Röm. Trag. p. 501, for similar reasons.

³ Ovid (Met. 9. 409 ff.) refers briefly to the story, as if the details were familiar: attonitusque malis, exul mentisque domusque, | vultibus Eumenidum matrisque

Alcmaeon, pursued by the avenging spirit of his mother, came to Psophis in Arcadia, where Phegeus the king purified him and gave him his daughter Alpheisiboea (Arsinoe, according to Apollod.) to wife. Alcmaeon gave to her the famous necklace and robe of Harmonia. His madness, however, was not allayed, and Alcmaeon was commanded by the Delphic oracle to settle in a new land which had been left dry by the sea since the pollution of the murder. Accordingly he went to the delta of the Achelous, where new land was continually being formed by the silting of the river; and there he settled and married Callirrhoe, the daughter of the river-god. But his new wife sighed for the necklace and would not be comforted, until Alcmaeon promised to return to Psophis and fetch it for her. Arriving at Psophis, he pretended to Phegeus that the oracle required the dedication of the necklace at Delphi as a condition of his release from the madness¹; Phegeus believed the story and handed it over. One of Alcmaeon's attendants, however, betrayed the secret about Callirrhoe, with the result that he was waylaid and killed by the sons of Phegeus at their father's bidding. To Propertius (i. 15. 15) we owe a dramatic touch which does not appear in the other authorities,—although Apollodorus gives a hint of Arsinoe's disagreement with her brothers: *Alpheisiboea suos ulla est pro coniuge fratres, | sanguinis et cari vincula rupit amor*². Perhaps then, as Welcker suggests, Alcmaeon was given a more creditable rôle than is indicated by the account of Apollodorus. It may be added that fr. 108 exactly fits the situation, if we suppose it spoken by Phegeus or Alpheisiboea in answer to Alcmaeon's request for the necklace, when he alleged that it was required for the god. If the right view has been taken above, it is clear that Valckenaer (Diatr. p. 150) was wrong in referring Tr. fr. adesp. 358 to this play. If written by Sophocles at all, the verses belong rather to the Epigoni, as Ribbeck (p. 495) thought³.

agitabitur umbris, | donec eum coniux fatale poposcerit aurum, | cognatumque latus Phegeius hauscrit ensis. He goes on to describe the prayer of Callirrhoe that her sons might be immediately brought to manhood, in order to avenge their father's murder. The sequel is related by Apollodorus, but is hardly relevant to the play of Sophocles.

¹ Cf. Athen. 132 F, where the oracle is given.

² The other authorities, as we have seen, make Callirrhoe the avenger of Alcmaeon's death. Unfortunately little or nothing is known of the Alcmaeon and Alpheisiboea of Accius. Nevertheless, Welcker and Ahrens have endeavoured to reconstruct the plot of Sophocles from his fragments, concluding (e.g.) from Alphes. fr. 1X sed angustate inclusam ac saxi, squalidam that Alpheisiboea was imprisoned by her brothers in order to prevent her from avenging Alcmaeon's death.

³ Inf. p. 131.

108

εἴθ' εὖ φρονήσαντ' εἰσίδοιμί πως φρενῶν ἐπήβολον καλῶν σε.

108 Porphyr. qu. Hom. 1 τὸ δὲ ἐπήβολος σημαίνει τὸν ἐπιτυχῆ καὶ ἐγκρατῆ ἀπὸ τῆς βολῆς καὶ τοῦ βάλλειν... Σοφοκλῆς 'Ἀλκμαίωνι. 'εἴθ'...σε.' Eustath. Od. p. 1448, 6 ἐπήβολος δὲ οὐ ποιητικὴ (i.e. Homeric) λέξις, ἀλλὰ Ἀττικὴ κατὰ τοὺς παλαιούς, οἱ καὶ προφέρουσι. Σοφοκλῆς 'εἴθ'...σε.' Nauck remarks that the present passage may also be referred to by Eustath. Il. p. 625, 38 οὕτω δὲ καὶ 'φρενῶν ἐπήβολος.'

'Would that I might see thee, with thy wits restored, the master of a clear brain.' The reading has been much canvassed, and Campbell condemns the 'unmeaning tautology' of the text. Thus Cobet ejected εὖ φρονήσαντ' as a gloss, Ribbeck corrected it to εὐτυχήσαντ', F. W. Schmidt to οὐ φρονήσαντ', Wecklein to ἀφρονήσαντ', Gomperz to εὖ φρονήσας, and Nauck (in his earlier edition) to εὖ φρενῶσαντ'. It is perhaps presumptuous to ignore such a chorus of suspicion, but the text does not seem to me, if fairly interpreted, to be in any way abnormal. It should be observed (1) that εὖ φρονήσαντ' is ingressive, as in Plat. Phaedr. 231 D πῶς ἂν εὖ φρονήσαντες ταῦτα καλῶς

ἔχειν ἡγήσαντο; so φρονήσας in O. T. 649 (Jebb's n.). Mekler adds Eur. Bacch. 1259. (2) that ἐπήβολον (ὄρτα), and not εὖ φρονήσαντ' (= ὅταν εὖ φρονήσῃς), is dependent on εἰσίδοιμί: for the omission of ὦν as a supplementary participle see Eur. Hclid. 332, Phoen. 1163, Her. 516, Goodw. § 911, Starkie on Ar. Vesp. 1526. There is thus no necessity for Dindorf's καὶ in place of πως, or Mekler's τ' after φρενῶν. So far as the redundancy of expression is concerned, it is hardly more remarkable than in Ant. 492 λυσσώσαν αὐτὴν οὐδ' ἐπήβολον φρενῶν. Sophocles may have taken this touch from Herodotus: see 3. 25 οἶα δὲ ἐμμανὴς τε ἔων καὶ οὐ φρενήρης, 35 παραφρονέειν καὶ οὐκ εἶναι νόημον. See also on fr. 28, Jebb on O. T. 58. For the word ἐπήβολος see Jebb on Ant. l. c. and Blomfield gloss. to Aesch. Prom. 452 (460). The form (for ἐπίβολος) is supposed to be due to metrical lengthening: Giles, Manual of Comp. Phil. § 220. Cf. παρὰβολος, καταβόλτης, κατηβολῆς (Eur. fr. 614).—For φρενῶν καλῶν cf. Eur. fr. 548 τί τῆς εὐμορφίας | ὄφελος, ὅταν τις μὴ φρένας καλὰς ἔχη.

109

αἰνῶ

109 Hesych. I p. 81 αἰνῶ· παρήμι, παραιτοῦμαι. καὶ ἐπαινῶ. Σοφοκλῆς 'Ἀλκμαίωνι (corrected by M. Schmidt for cod. ἀλμαίωνι). Bekk. anecd. p. 358, 28 and Suid. αἰνῶ· παραιτοῦμαι. Σοφοκλῆς. καὶ ἐπαινῶ. Suid. adds to this καὶ αἰνῶ σε. Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 55, 5 αἰνῶ· παραιτοῦμαι καὶ ἐπαινῶ. Σοφοκλῆς. It is more usual to find ἐπαινῶ in the sense of a polite refusal: Ar. Ran. 508 κάλλιστ', ἐπαινῶ, which is equivalent to the Latin bene vocas: tam gratias (Plaut. Men. 387). In Phil. 889 αἰνῶ τάδ', ὦ παῖ, καὶ μ' ἐπαίρ' ὥσπερ νοεῖς, as may be the case with our 'thank you,' the words accompany an assent. On that passage Jebb refers to Hes. Op. 643 (quoted on fr. 28), which the scholl. explain by παραιτῶσθαι, as does Plut. poet. aud. 6 p. 22 F.

110

ἀραίας

110 Hesych. I p. 269 ἀραίας· βλαβέραι. Σοφοκλῆς 'Ἀλκμαίωνι (so Musurus for ἀλκμαῖ cod.).

Cf. Etym. M. p. 134, 14 ἡ παρὰ τὸ ἄρεος, βλαπτικοῦ ὄντος, ἀρὰ ἡ βλαβή· καὶ ἀραῖα βλαία, δεινὰ, χαλεπὰ, ὀδυνηρά.

ἀραῖος, meaning fraught with a curse, has a double aspect like προστρόπαιος (see my ed. of Eur. Heracleidae, p. 148), ἀλαστωρ, παλαμναίος. For the meaning dangerous, i.e. bringing a curse upon others, cf. O. T. 1291 μενῶν δόμοις ἀραίος, Trach. 1202 καὶ νέρθεν ὦν ἀραίος εἰσάει βαρύς, Aesch. Ag. 247 φθόγγον ἀραίον ὅκος, Eur. I. T. 778 ἡ σοὶς ἀραὶα δώμασιν γενήσομαι, Hipp. 1415 εἰθ' ἦν ἀραίον δαίμοσιν βροτῶν γένος, Med. 608 καὶ σοὶς ἀραία γ' οὖσα τυγχάνω δόμοις. See also on fr. 399. The sinner and his victim are both ἀραίει as implicated in ἀρα, and possible sources of pollution: the so-called 'active' and 'passive' senses of the adj. have a common starting-point.

ΑΜΥΚΟΣ ΣΑΤΥΡΙΚΟΣ

This play related to an incident which happened on the outward voyage of the Argonauts and is recounted among the feats of Polydeuces. Amycus, the inhospitable king of the Bebrycians in Bithynia, used to forbid all strangers to land on his coast and fetch water for their ships, until they had fought a boxing-match with him. Hitherto he had always killed his opponents, but when the Argonauts arrived he met his conqueror in Polydeuces (Apollod. i. 119, Hygin. fab. 17). The boxing-match is described by Apoll. Rhod. 2. 1—97 and Theocr. 22. 27—134. Whether these writers took any hints from Sophocles it is impossible to say, but one point in which they differ is deserving of notice. According to Apollonius, with whom most of the other authorities agree, Amycus was killed by Polydeuces; but Theocritus (131 ff.) represents Polydeuces as sparing his life, and merely requiring him to swear an oath by his father Poseidon never to maltreat strangers in the future. Similarly, according to schol. Ap. Rhod. 2. 98, both Epicharmus (fr. 7 K.) and Periander stated that he was put in chains. Such an ending was more suitable to a satyr-play. We may conjecture that the satyrs were his slaves, and were liberated after the defeat of their master¹.

III

γέρανοι, χελῶναι, γλαῦκες, ἰκτῖνοι, λαγοί

111 Athen. 400 B τῇ δὲ τὸν λαγὸν ἐνικῇ αἰτιατικῇ ἀκόλουθός ἐστιν ἡ παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν' Ἀμύκῳ σατυρικῇ πληθυντικῇ ὀνομαστικῇ 'γέρανοι...λαγοί'... (C) οὕτως (sc. λαγός) δ' ἐχρήσατο τῷ ὀνόματι καὶ Ἐπίχαρμος (fr. 60 Kaibel) καὶ Ἡρόδοτος καὶ ὁ τοῖς Εἰλωτας ποιήσας. εἰτά ἐστὶ τὸ μὲν Ἰακὸν λαγός (Amipsias fr. 181 675 K.) 'λαγὸν παρῆξας πῖθι τὸν θαλάσσιον,' τὸ δὲ λαγός Ἀττικόν.

λέγουσι δὲ καὶ Ἀττικοὶ λαγός, ὡς Σοφοκλῆς 'γέρανοι, κορῶναι, γλαῦκες, ἰκτῖνοι, λαγοί.' Gramm. Herm. p. 320 = Cramer anecd. Par. IV p. 245, 24 τὸ μὲν λαγός... εὑρίσκειται παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ 'γλαῦκες, ἰκτῖνοι (ἰκτῖς καὶ anecd. Par.), λαγοί.' Eustath. Od. p. 1534, 15 quotes from Athenaeus, giving as from Sophocles the words 'γλαῦκες, ἰκτῖνες, λαγοί.'

¹ See Introductory Note to the Ichneutae.

Whether κορώναι in the second quotation of Athenaeus is a mistake for χελώνας, or vice versa, and in what connexion this strange list was cited, it does not seem possible to determine.

λαγός is the plural of the Ionic λαγός, answering to the Attic λαγώς. The fact that it appeared in tragedy does not, of course, justify its use in ordinary Attic (Rutherford, New Phryn. p. 273). Phrynichus says: λαγός, ὁ Ἀττικός. διὰ δὲ τοῦ ὁ Ἰων (p. 186 Lob.). See Weir Smyth, Ionic Dialect, § 478, K. Z. xxix 109. The nom. λαγός is evidenced by the acc. plur. λαγός in Hes. Scut. 302 τοὶ δ' ὠκύποδας λαγός ἦρεν | ἄνδρες θηρενταί. Meineke thought that Sophocles must have written λαγός.

112

σιαγόνας τε δὴ μαλθακὰς τίθησι

112 Athen. 94 ε σιαγόνος δὲ Κρατῖνος... καὶ Σοφοκλῆς Ἀμόκιφ 'σιαγόνας... τίθησι.' Porson proposed to make an iambic trimeter by placing δὴ after τίθησι; and δὴ in this position and with temporal meaning occurs in Trach. 460, Phil. 1065, and elsewhere (Eur. Hel. 134 n.). Mekler thought that the metre might be trochaic tetrameter. Blaydes preferred the order τίθησι μαλθακὰς, with σου for δὴ. H., however, suggests that μαλθακὰς τίθησι is an ithyphallic following a trimeter, as in Aesch. Prom. 610 γεγυμνάσασιν, οὐδ' ἔχω μαθεῖν δπη | πημονὰς ἀλύξω. The words clearly describe the punishment inflicted by one pugilist upon another. H. quotes Herond. 8. 8 μέγρι σευ παραστᾶσα | τὸ βρέγμα τῷ σκίπτωσι μαλθακὸν θῶμαι. Com. fr. adesp. 125 (III 432 K.) ἀν μὴ ποιήσω πέποινα μαστιγῶν δλον, | ἄν μὴ ποιήσω σπογγῶς μαλακώτερον | τὸ πρόσωπον. Plaut. Aul. 422 ita fustibus sum mollior magis quam ullus cinaedus. Add Plaut. Mil. 1424 mitis sum equidem fustibus, Ter. Eun. 1028 utinam tibi committigari videam sandalio caput. So perhaps μαλάξης in Ar. Eg. 389.

ΑΜΦΙΑΡΕΩΣ ΣΑΤΥΡΙΚΟΣ

Tragedies bearing the title Amphiaræus were composed by Carcinus (TGF p. 797) and Cleophon (Suid.), as well as comedies by Aristophanes, Plato, Apollodorus of Carystus, and Philippides (Kock I 396, 604, III 280, 302).

It is difficult to guess which part of Amphiaræus' story was suitable for a satyr-play. A suggestion has been made in the note on fr. 113, but there is no other evidence to confirm or rebut it, and the words of the fragment itself are exceptionally obscure. An alternative subject, which has perhaps more claim to consideration on general grounds, would be the part taken by Amphiaræus in the events which led to the founding of the Nemean games. In that case the plot would cover the same ground as the Nemea of Aeschylus (TGF p. 49) and the Hypsipyle of Euripides (Ox. Pap. VI p. 21 ff.). The story of the death of the child Opheltes or Archemorus, in whose honour the games were founded, is told practically in the same form by Apollod. 3. 64—66 and Hygin. fab. 74. The locality, a remote fountain guarded by a dragon, was especially suitable to a satyr-play; and the subject was clearly capable of lighter handling than the fortunes of Amphiaræus at Argos or at Thebes.

113

ὁ πινοτήρης τοῦδε μάντεως χορός

113 πινοτήρης cod. : corr. Dindorf | χορός Meineke: χοροῦ cod.

113 Schol. V Ar. Vesp. 1510 πινοτήρης...καρκίνιον τί ἐστὶ σύννομον καὶ ἀεὶ ταύτην προσεχόμενον (προσδεχόμενον cod.). Σοφοκλῆς Ἀμφιαράω ὁ πινοτήρης...χοροῦ.

The fabulous story of the πινοτήρης is several times referred to, but not always told in the same way. According to Plut. de soll. an. 30 p. 980 A it caused Chrysippus to waste a great deal of ink,—because it provided him with an excellent illustration of πρῶνα. His account is preserved by Athen. 89 D (11 729 A Am.), quoted from the 5th book of the treatise περὶ τοῦ καλοῦ καὶ τῆς ἡδονῆς: ἡ πίννη, φησί, καὶ ὁ πινοτήρης συνεργὰ ἀλλήλοις, κατ' ἰδίαν οὐ δυνάμενα συμμεῖναι. ἡ μὲν οὖν πίννη ὀστρεὸν ἐστίν, ὁ δὲ πινοτήρης καρκίνος μικρὸς. καὶ ἡ πίννη διαστήσασα τὸ ὀστρακὸν ἡσυχάζει τηροῦσα τὰ ἐπείσιοντα ἰχθόδια, ὁ δὲ πινοτήρης παρεστῶς, ὅταν εἰσέλθῃ τι, δάκνει αὐτήν, ὥσπερ σημαίνων, ἡ δὲ δηχθεῖσα συμμῖναι καὶ οὕτως τὸ ἀποληφθὲν ἔνδον κατεσθίουσι κοῦή. Cic. n. d. 2. 123 no doubt comes ultimately from Chrysippus; and there are other authorities to the same effect. But in Cic. fin. 3. 63 at illa, quae in concha patula pina dicitur, isque, qui enat e concha, qui, quod eam custodit, pinoteres vocatur, in eandemque cum se recepit, includitur, ut videatur monuisse, ut caveret...aliorum etiam causa quaedam faciunt, the pea-crab does not assist the bivalve to obtain nourishment, but warns it against approaching danger; and this is the version given in a letter to Linnaeus, quoted by Mayor (on n. d. l.c.) from the English Cyclopaedia, which is of particular interest as showing that in the middle of the 18th century the Levantine Greeks continued to regale strangers with the same fable to which their ancestors had given currency more than 2000 years before. Modern science recognizes the fact that the pea-crab habitually resides in the shell of the pinna, but does not countenance the rest of the story. It remains to ascertain how Sophocles made the allusion relevant. Ellendt, who is followed by Campbell (keeping χοροῦ), absurdly supposes that a number of μάντεες appeared in the play, and that the shortest of them by a ridiculous comparison was called πινοτήρης. So L. and S. interpret a little parasitical fellow. But there is not the slightest reason to suppose that Aristophanes was parodying Sophocles, although, when the comic poet says of the sons of Carcinus (the Crab) 'here's the πινοτήρης of the family,' it is not difficult to infer that the 'baby-crab' is meant. There was no Carcinus in Sophocles, and, as we can hardly refer τοῦδε μάντεως to anyone but Amphiaraus, it seems likely that Meineke was right in restoring χορός for χοροῦ. Even then the point of the allusion is obscure; but the only situation in the story of Amphiaraus, so far as it is known to us, which might possibly account for it, and would at the same time be suitable for treatment in a satyr-play, is the incident related by Hygin. fab. 73 (cf. Serv. on Verg. Aen. 6. 445. Myth. Vat. 1 152), how that Amphiaraus, knowing that he would perish at Thebes, concealed himself from Adrastus and the rest with the connivance of Eriphyle, and was subsequently discovered in consequence of the treachery of his wife, who was bribed by her brother with a golden necklace. According to Stat. Theb. 3. 570 ff. (cf. 606, 619), Amphiaraus hid himself in his house, and refused to tell the result of his divination. May we suppose that in such circumstances the satyr-chorus was posted outside in order to give timely warning to the seer of the approach of danger? Welcker (Nachr. p. 318) also conjectured on the strength of this fragment that the satyrs were taken by Amphiaraus into his service as attendants in the rites of divination. Bergk thought that a crowd following at the heels of the seer was meant, and that Tiresias was the seer in question.

114

ἐνθ' οὔτε πέλλεις οἱ ἀγραυλος βότος

114 Cramer anecd. Ocho. i p. 344, 8 πολιοῖο· οὐκ ἀγροῦμεν τὴν ἀκριβῆ γραφὴν 'πελιοῖο.'... πελιοῖο οὐν παρὰ τὸ πέλλω (πελλός Schneidewin). 'ἐνθ'... βότος.' Σοφοκλῆς ἐν 'Αμφιαράω σατυρικῷ. For Erotian gloss. Hippocr. p. 109, 7, which appears to quote the word πελλός as occurring in this play, see on fr. 509.

The text is desperately corrupt. Loebbeck elicited from it ἐνθού τε πέλλης οἰς ἀγραυλον βοτόν, and from him Nauck adopts πελλῆς οἰς, leaving the other words untouched. βότος, for which Cramer substituted βοτήρ, is anyhow corrupt. Schneidewin preferred ἐνδύοντα πελλῆς μὲν ἀγραυλου βοός, which Dindorf approved with the exception that he proposed ἐνδύς τε in place of ἐνδύοντα. For πελλός (or πέλλος) see on fr. 509. ἀγραυλοιο βοός in Hom. Ω 81 (cf. M 252) perhaps lends some support to Schneidewin's correction of the last two words.

115

ἐτ' αὖ... ὥσπερ ἀλιεύς πληγείς... <φρ> ἐνὼν διδάσκαλος

115 φρενῶν restituit E. A. I. Ahrens

115 Schol. Plat. Symp. 222 B ὁ ἀλιεύς πληγείς νοῦν φύσει. φασὶ γὰρ ἀλίεα ἀγκιστρειῶντα, ἐπειδὴν σπᾶσθ τῷ λινῷ τὸν ἰχθύον, τῇ χειρὶ προσαναγόντα κατέχειν, ἵνα μὴ φύγῃ· τοῦτο δὲ συνήθως ποιοῦντα ὑπὸ σκορπίου πληγῆναι καὶ εἰπεῖν (vulgo εἶπε) 'πληγείς νοῦν φύσει,' καὶ μηκέτι προσάγειν ἐξ ἐκείνου τὴν χεῖρα. κέχρηται τῇ παροιμίᾳ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν 'Αμφιαράω σατυρικῷ λέγων 'ἐτ' αὖ... ὥσπερ ἀλιεύς πληγείς... ἐνὼν διδάσκαλος.' Zenob. 2. 14 (Miller, Mélanges de litt. gr. p. 371) ἀλιεύς πληγείς νοῦν οἶσει (an φύσει?);... μέμνηται αὐτῆς Σοφοκλῆς.

This is the Greek equivalent for our 'once bit, twice shy,' and is one of the many proverbs which attest the value of a hard experience. Plato, whose words are κατὰ τὴν παροιμίαν, ὥσπερ νήπιον παθόντα γινώσκαι, is referring to Hom. P 32 βεχθῆν δέ τε νήπιος ἔγνω or Hes. Op. 216 παθὼν δέ τε νήπιος ἔγνω. See also schol. Aristid. III 681 Dind. Cf. Aesch. Ag. 186 τὸν φρονεῖν βροτοῦς ὁδὴ | σάντα, τὸν πάθει μάθος | θέττα κυρίως ἔχειν, Eum. 524 ξυμφέρεε σωφρονεῖν ὑπὸ στίνει.

Of the attempts which have been made to supply the missing words, the best is Headlam's: εἰσαῖθις [ὥσπερ] ἀλιεύς <εἰσομαι> πληγείς <φρονεῖν> | ἡμπερίᾳ γὰρ τῶν φρ> ἐνὼν διδάσκαλος. Here the second line at any rate fits admirably with the requirements of the case. It is of course possible that ὥσπερ is a gloss, but the first line might also run: εἰσαῖθις ἀλιεύς ὥσπερ πληγείς φρονά. Kock suggested: σὺ γ' ὥσπερ ἀλιεύς σκορπίου πληγείς ὑπο | πολλοῖς γενήσῃ κτέ.

116

ἀγνίσαι

116 Hesych. i p. 26 ἀγνίσαι (ἀγνῆσαι cod.)· ἀποθῆσαι. Βουσίρῳ (i.e. Eur. fr. 314). καὶ διαφθεῖραι. Σοφοκλῆς ἐν 'Αμφιαράω. Bekk. anecd. p. 339, 8 ἀγνίσαι· τὸ θῆσαι, διαφθεῖραι, κατ' ἀντίφρασιν. οὕτω Σοφοκλῆς. To the same effect Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 19, 17. For ἀντίφρασις, which is sometimes entitled εὐφημισμός, see Rutherford, Annotation, p. 270.

ἀγνίσαι, 'to consecrate,' may sometimes involve destruction, as in the sacrifice of a victim. The best parallel is Eur. I. T. 705 ἀμφὶ βωμῶν ἀγνισθεὶς φόνῳ, of Orestes supposed to be sacrificed at Tauri. Cf. Suppl. 1211 σώμαθ' ἡγνισθη πυρί. So Headlam explained A. P. 7. 49 (Bianor's epitaph on Euripides) ἡγνισσε τὸν θνατὰν σώματος ἱστορήν, i.e. destroyed the inscription which described Euripides as mortal (C. R. xvi 438). See also Ant. 1081 κῶνες καθήγγισαν with Jebb's n. Blaydes would prefer ἀγίσαι, and καθήγγισαν in Ant. l.c.

117

ἀλεξαίθριον

117 Hesych. i p. 117 ἀλεξαίθριον· θερμὸν σκέπασμα. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀμφιαράω. The word was doubtless modelled on the Homeric ἀλεξάνεμος; see on fr. 1112 χειμάμυνα. The latter part of the compound suggests the cold of a clear frosty night: cf. fr. 149, 3 πάγων φάνεντος αἰθρίου, Ant. 338 δυσαύλων πάγων ἐναίθρεια... βέλη, Aesch. Ag. 347 τῶν ὑπαιθρίων πάγων. Blaydes needlessly conjectured ἀλεξαίθρον.

118

τρασιά

118 Zonar. lex. p. 1742 τρασιά· ὁ τόπος ἐνθα τὰ σῦκα ξηραίνεται, παρὰ τὸ τερσαίνειν τὸ ξηραίνειν. ὁ δὲ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν τῷ σατυρικῷ (ἐτέρῳ cod.) Ἀμφιαράω ἐπὶ τῇ ἄλῳ τέθεικε τὴν λέξιν. The same extract occurs in schol. Ael. nat. an. 3. 10 with the variants τρασιά (which is right) παρὰ τοῦ τερσαίνειν for παρὰ τὸ τερσαίνειν, and the omission of τῷ σατυρικῷ.

τρασιά is rightly explained as a drying-place, but Sophocles is the only authority quoted who used the word for a threshing-floor. The name is suitable, as a dry spot exposed to the wind was selected for threshing; see the commentators on Verg. Georg. i. 178. τρασιά is particularly applied to the drying of figs. Aelian l.c. relates of the hedgehog: ἐαυτὸν ἐν ταῖς τρασiais κυλλεῖ καὶ τῶν ἰσχάδων τὰς περιπαρέσσας, αἱ πολλαὶ ἐμπήγνυνται ταῖς ἀκάνθαις, ἥσυχῃ κομίζει κτέ. Suid. s. v. also speaks of the drying of cheeses.

119

φρονεῖν

119 Erotian testifies that φρονεῖν was used by Sophocles in this play with the sense of νοεῖν: see fr. 91.

120

ὠρακιᾶσαι

120 Schol. Ar. Ran. 481 ὠρακιᾶσαι δὲ λέγεται τὸ ὑπὸ φόβου ὠχριάσαι· ἀπὸ τοῦ τὴν ὥραν αἰκίζειν. τοῦτο δὲ Σοφοκλῆς εἶπεν ἐν Ἀμφιαράω σατυρικῷ. τὸ ὠχριάσαι θλιβομένης τῆς καρδίας. τοῦτο δὲ πολλοῖς γίγνεται. The word occurs twice in Aristophanes (Ran. 481, Pac. 702) in the sense of to faint away. Hence Moeris p. 214, 21 ὠρακιᾶν Ἀττικῶς, λειποφθεῖν Ἑλληνικῶς. The origin of this obscure word is unknown. The ancients gave two explanations of it: (1) as a by-form of ὠχριάω; and (2) as derived from ὥραν αἰκίζειν. The former was the Alexandrian view, as we learn from the scholiast on the Pax, who says that Eratosthenes; dissenting from Lycophron, held that ὠρακιᾶν was not strictly the pallor, but the antecedent dizziness arising from faintness. Fritzsche thought that the scholiast attributed to Sophocles the form ὠρακίζεω, which must have fallen out before the explanation ἀπὸ τοῦ τὴν ὥραν αἰκίζειν. He supports his view by Eryth. M. p. 823, 33 ὠρακίζω, παρὰ τὸ αἰκίζεσθαι τὴν ὥραν.

121

[Σοφοκλῆς τὰ γράμματα παράγει ὀρχούμενον]

121 Athen. 454 F, after quoting certain passages in which an illiterate person is introduced giving a description of the letters composing a particular word, and amongst them the well-known fragment of Euripides (fr. 382), proceeds: καὶ Σοφοκλῆς δὲ τούτῳ παραπλήσιον ἐποίησεν ἐν Ἀμφιαράῳ σατυρικῷ τὰ γράμματα παράγων ὀρχούμενον.

The expressive character of Greek dancing is abundantly warranted; it was above all the demonstration of an idea. Lucian de salt. 69 καὶ γὰρ διανοίας ἐπιδεικνὺν τὰ γινόμενα ἔχει, καὶ σωματικῆς ἀσκησεως ἐνέργειαν. Plat. legg. 816 A διὸ μίμησις τῶν λεγομένων σχήμασι γενομένη τὴν ὀρχηστικὴν ἐξεργάσατο τέχνην ὑμψασαν. Plutarch (qu. conv. 9. 15) divides dancing into φορὰ, σχῆμα, and δαίξις, and says of the second (p. 747 C): ὅταν...σχῆμα διαθέντες ἐπὶ τοῦ σώματος γραφικῶς τοῖς εἰδεσιν ἐπιμένωσι. ibid. p. 748 A ποίησιν γὰρ εἶναι τὴν ὀρχησιν σιωπῶσαν, καὶ φθεγγομένην ὀρχησιν πάλιν τὴν ποίησιν. Lucian de salt. 63, Demetrius said to a dancer: ἀκούω ἃ ποιεῖς, οὐχ ὅρῳ μόνον, ἀλλὰ μοι δοκεῖς ταῖς χερσὶν αὐταῖς λαλεῖν. Athen. 22 A: Telestes, the dancer of Aeschylus, was so skilful, that, when dancing the Seven against Thebes, he expressed the whole plot by his art.

ΑΜΦΙΤΡΥΩΝ

Euripides wrote an Alcmena, about which we have better information than has been preserved concerning the Amphitryon of Sophocles; for scholars are agreed that the chief dramatic innovation introduced by Euripides was that Amphitryon punished Alcmena for her supposed unfaithfulness by burning her on a funeral-pyre, and that only the timely intervention of Zeus rescued her from destruction: see Nauck, TGF p. 386, Wilamowitz, Eur. Herakl. I p. 54. Wernicke (in Pauly-Wissowa I 1573) infers that Sophocles followed the earlier version recorded by Apollod. 2. 61, according to which the deception practised by Zeus and his intercourse with Alcmena were made known to Amphitryon through the agency of Tiresias. The old guess that the Amphitryon was a satyr-play (Osann in Rh. Mus. II 312) has nothing in its favour, unless indeed Porson's view of fr. 1127 is adopted. Accius wrote an Amphitryon, which is thought to have been adapted from Sophocles, principally because the only other tragedy so entitled was written by the Alexandrian Aeschylus (TGF p. 824). In any case, the plot may be taken to have covered the same ground as the well-known travesty of Plautus. Hartung and Schoell maintained that both Sophocles and Accius dramatized the story of Euripides' Heracles under this title, but their view was rightly rejected by Ribbeck (p. 557).

122

ἐπεὶ δὲ βλάστοι, τῶν τριῶν μίαν λαβεῖν
εὐσοιαν ἀρκεῖ.

122 Schol. Soph. O. C. 390 εὐνοίας χάριν] ἐν τοῖς ἀναγκαιοτέροις τῶν ἀντιγράφων γράφεται εὐσοίας χάριν, ὃ καὶ οἱ ὑπομνηματιστάμενοι ἀξιοῦσιν· εὐσοιαν δὲ φασὶ τὴν εὐθύνειαν (εὐσθένειαν Suid. s.v. εὐσοία) καθάπερ καὶ ἐν Ἀμφιτρώωνι ἔπει...ἀρκεῖ.

εὐσοίας has been restored to the text of the O. C. from the schol., but the word does not occur elsewhere. The adj. εὐσοος is found in Theocr. 24. 8. Cf. Hesych. II p. 233 εὐσοία· εὐθηνία, σωτηρία.

The meaning of this fragment is obscure. Welcker (p. 372) interpreted: 'when he is grown, to receive one of these three provides security.' He supposes that Zeus promised to Heracles three safeguards to protect him amidst the dangers of his life, one of which would be at any time sufficient to keep him unharmed; and compares the golden hair of Pterelaus, son of Taphius (Apollod. 2. 51), and for the triplication of the security the three prayers of Theseus. Hartung renders: 'it suffices to find one of your three roads to safety,' but refrains from explaining his meaning further. Neither of these versions takes due account of ἐπεὶ βλάστοι, which must be regarded as a clause of general assumption: cf. Trach. 93 καὶ γὰρ ὑστέρῳ τὸ γ' εὖ | πράσσειν, ἐπεὶ πύθοιο, κέρδος ἐμπολῶ (J.'s n.). To substitute βλάστη, as Elendt and others have proposed, would make no difference, unless ἀρκεῖ is taken to be a dynamic (prophetic) present. Bearing this in mind, I cannot help suspecting that the words may refer to the miraculous growth of the heads of the Lernaean Hydra (ἀμφίκρανον καὶ παλιμβλαστὴ κόνα Eur. Her. 1274): 'and, whenever it grows, it is enough that one of the three should be preserved.' The details of the story are variously recorded: Alcaeus (fr. 118) spoke of nine heads, Simonides (fr. 203) of fifty, and Euripides (Her. 1188) of a hundred; and the later authorities have the same or similar variations. Thus it would not be surprising to find that Sophocles mentioned an outcrop of three heads at a time, one of which always survived. And there is a further detail in the mythological handbooks which would help to explain the text. Besides the ordinary version that two heads grew for every one cut off, Apollodorus (2. 77) relates that of the nine heads eight were mortal, but the middle one was immortal (τὰς μὲν ὀκτὼ θνητάς, τὴν δὲ μέσσην ἀθάνατον): see also ib. 80, Pindar. 7. Similarly, Aristonicus of Tarentum (FGH IV 337), a writer of uncertain date, said that 'the middle head' was golden.

For the short vowel before βλάστοι see Jebb on Phil. 1312.—Meineke thought that μίαν was an error for μᾶς.

123

ἀμφιτέρμως

123 Hesych. I p. 165 ἀμφιτέρμως· ἀπο<τε>τερματισμένως. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀμφιτρώωνι.

Nauck thinks this form incredible, and that either ἀμφιτερομύνως or ἀμφιτέρμων is required. But to conclude that an adj. ἀμφίτερος, 'hedged round,' is impossible would be rash in view of the evidence that has been adduced (see Brugmann Comp. Gr. II p. 27 E. tr.) for the substitution in compounds of o-stems for stems in n·: cf. κιάκρανον, ἀκμόθετον. It should be added that the preceding gloss in Hesych. is ἀμφιτέρμων (-τέρμων cod.)· ἀπο<τε>τερματισμένως.

124

ἄτμητον

124 Hesych. I p. 315 ἀτραυμάτιστον· Σοφοκλῆς Ἀμφιτρώωνι. ἄτμητον· ἀμέριστον.

Inasmuch as ἀτραυμάτιστον is entirely out of place in the alphabetical order, and has no explanatory gloss, the conclusion seems inevitable that ἄτμητον has dropped out before it, and that Sophocles used this word in the Amphitryon with the meaning invulnerable. This was practically the view of Salmasius, who arranged the words ἄτμητον· ἀμέριστον, ἀτραυμάτιστον. Σ. Ἀ. The gloss ἀμέριστον is probably a reference to Plat. Phaedr. 277 B. That ἀτραυμάτιστον was a possible word of explanation is shown by Etym. M. p. 110, 52 ἀνούτατος· ὁ ἀτραυμάτιστος. Nauck's suggestion that Σοφ. Ἀμφ. refers to a previous gloss ἀτμησίφων· οὐδεμίαι τὸ ληψι ἐννοίαν ἔχων has very little probability. And that is actually an error for ἀτμησίφων (Headlam on Aesch. Ag. 438).

[ΑΝΔΡΟΜΑΧΗ]

There is no other reference to a play of Sophocles bearing this title than that of fr. 125 quoted below. But, as there is independent evidence that Sophocles employed the word παρασάγγης with the meaning 'messenger' in the Ποιμένες (see fr. 520), and as Andromache is a character who may very well have appeared in that play, Welcker (p. 113) concludes that there was no such play as the Ἀνδρομάχη, and that fr. 125 really refers to the Ποιμένες. For errors due to the citation of a character in place of the name of a play see p. 38, and the note on fr. 161.

125

παρασάγγης

125 Etym. M. p. 652, 13 παρασάγγαι· τὰ τριάκοντα στάδια παρὰ Πέρσαις παρ' Αἰγυπτίους δ' ἑξήκοντα. παρὰ δὲ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἀνδρομάχῃ ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀγγέλου εἰρηται. To the same effect Etym. Gud. p. 452, 31 with the reading ἐν Ἀνδρομάχῃ.

Nauck in his first edition conjectured that ἐν Ἀνδρομέδῃ should be read, but now rightly inclines to Welcker's opinion referred to above.

For the word παρασάγγης see on fr. 520, and cf. fr. 183.

ΑΝΔΡΟΜΕΔΑ

There is some direct evidence of the events comprised in the plot of the Andromeda. See Eratosth. Catasterism. 16 (Westermann, Mythogr. p. 250) Κασιόπεια. ταύτην ἱστορεῖ Σοφοκλῆς ὁ τῆς τραγωδίας ποιητῆς ἐν Ἀνδρομέδῃ ἐρίσασαν περὶ κάλλους ταῖς Νηρησίην εἰσελθεῖν εἰς τὸ σύμπτωμα, καὶ Ποσειδῶνα διαφθεῖραι τὴν χώραν κῆτος ἐπιπέμψαντα, δι' ἣν <αἰτίαν> πρόκειται τῷ κῆτει ἢ θυγατρὶ οἰκείως. ἐσχημάτισται δὲ ἐγγὺς ἐπὶ δίφρῳ καθημένη. ib. 36 Κῆτος. τοῦτό ἐστιν ὁ Ποσειδῶν <ἐπ>έπεμψε Κηφεὶ διὰ τὸ Κασιόπειαν ἐρίσαι περὶ κάλλους ταῖς Νηρησίην. Περσεὺς δ' αὐτὸ ἀνείλε, καὶ διὰ τοῦτο εἰς τὰ ἄστρα ἐτέθη ὑπόμνημα τῆς πράξεως αὐτοῦ. ἱστορεῖ δὲ ταῦτα Σοφοκλῆς ὁ τῶν τραγῳδιῶν ποιητῆς ἐν τῇ Ἀνδρομέδᾳ. The same version is followed in two passages of the scholia to the Aratea of Germanicus Caesar (p. 138. 9, 21: see R. Ellis in J. P. IV 267, and now E. Maass, Comment. in Aratum, pp. 215, 257). Hygin. poet. astron. 2. 10 p. 443 Cassiopeia. de hac Euripides et Sophocles et alii complures dixerunt ut gloriata sit se forma Nereidas praestare. pro quo facto inter sidera sedens in seliquastro constituta est. But the play cannot be reconstructed to the same extent as is possible with the more famous Andromeda of Euripides. The plot of Euripides knows nothing of a previous betrothal to Agenor (or Phineus): Cepheus refuses the proposal of Perseus on other grounds, and his opposition is overcome by the appearance of Athena ἀπὸ μηχανῆς. It has been suggested¹ that Sophocles followed the version of the dénouement adopted by Hygin. fab. 64, according to which Cepheus and Agenor lay in wait for Perseus in order to slay him, but Perseus by showing them the Gorgon's head turned them into stone. But it is difficult to understand how the name of Sophocles found its way into the astronomical handbook, if there was nothing in his play to support the statement that the chief characters in the story were turned into stars. It should be observed that although the story of Perseus and Andromeda is not old—at least there is no trace of it in literature before the fifth century—it was already current at the time of the Persian wars, if we may lay any weight upon the statement of Herodotus (7. 150) that Xerxes claimed kinship with the Argives, as the descendant of Perses, the son of Perseus and Andromeda. It is improbable that Phrynichus had introduced Andromeda into one of his plays, as Dobree inferred from Ar. Nub. 556. The reference there is to a comedy: see schol. R. and Starkie's note.

Brunck, following Casaubon, considered that Sophocles' Andromeda was a satyr-play; but his opinion was founded on no stronger reason than the evidence afforded by fr. 136. Ribbeck, who takes the same view (Röm. Trag. p. 163₁₆₉), thinks that fr. 127 has a comic tone and also refers to fr. 132; but his main reason is that Euripides' play would not have been regarded as a startling novelty—as it undoubtedly was—if Sophocles had already treated the subject in a serious manner. But the innovation of Euripides was rather in the romantic setting.

E. Petersen² endeavoured to reconstruct the Andromeda of

¹ So Wernicke in Pauly-Wissowa I 2156.

² J. H. S. XXIV (1904) pp. 104—112. The identification had been made by earlier critics: see also E. Kuhnert in Roscher III 1994.

Sophocles from a hydria in the British Museum (E 169) which is undoubtedly earlier than 412 B.C., the date of Euripides' play, and is consequently inferred to have been influenced by Sophocles. The painting shows Perseus arriving on foot, whereas in the works of art which follow Euripides he descends from the air; Cepheus weeping for his daughter's fate; posts being fixed into the ground, to which Andromeda is to be lashed; and funeral offerings carried by slaves, as if the king's daughter were already dead. But most stress is laid upon the figure of an effeminate oriental supported by two attendants, who is identified with Phineus¹, the plighted lover of Andromeda. From these materials Petersen draws the inference that the characters of the cowardly barbarian who abandoned his betrothed, and of the heroic Greek who rescued her, were brought into strong contrast at an early stage of the action, and that the subsequent conflict between Perseus and the barbarians was due not to the opposition of Cepheus, but to the renewal of his claim by Phineus after the rescue of the heroine. Petersen further contends that Accius followed Sophocles in his Andromeda, whereas Ennius had as usual copied Euripides; but even if he is right, the Latin fragments are too ambiguous to assist his general argument. The value of the archaeological evidence must be left for others to determine²; but the attempts by means of it to establish a connexion with Eur. Alc. 611 ff., and to interpret fr. 130 as referring to funeral vases, and fr. 133 as a description of Phineus yoked to his attendants cannot be approved.

126

δημιόθυτον κούρειον ἡρέθη πόλει· τοῖς βαρβάροις γάρ ἐστιν ἀρχῆθεν νόμος γέρας βρότειον τῷ Κρόνῳ θνηπολεῖν.

126. 1 ἡμιοντὸν cod.: corr. Tucker | κούρειον Musurus: κόνιον codd. 2 sq. ordinem verborum in hunc modum disposui: νόμος γάρ ἐστι τοῖς βαρβάροις θνηπολεῖν βρότειον ἀρχῆθεν γέρας τῷ Κρόνῳ cod. 3 γέρας Buttman: γέρος cod.

126 Hesych. II p. 526 κούρειον. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀνδρομέδα. 'ἡμιοντὸν...Κρόνῳ.'

1 The best correction of the corrupt ἡμιοντὸν is Tucker's δημιόθυτον (C. R. XVII 190), which H. was inclined to prefer to his own τιμήθυτον or τιμώθυτον (C. R. XIV 113 n.). Both were partly anticipated by M. Schmidt's ιερέθυτον, Diels's ἀλίθυτον ἤ and Mekler's μιαίθυτον. Less probable conjectures are αἰμώρυτον Scaliger, ἐνιαύσιον O. Hense, ἡμῶν θνῶν Campbell (perhaps better ἢ δ' ἐκθυτον), ἡμῶν τόδ' οὖν J. On the assumption that κόνιον could stand, which is most improbable, Herwerden proposed ἀζήμιον ('culpa vacans') τὸ κόριον.—For the Attic κοῦρειον, an offering made in connexion with the ceremony of introduction to the phratries see Pollux 8. 107 καὶ εἰς ἡλικίαν προελθόντων ἐν τῇ καλούμενῃ κουρεωτίδι ἡμέρᾳ ὑπὲρ μὲν τῶν ἀρρένων τὸ κοῦρειον ἔθουσιν, ὑπὲρ δὲ τῶν θηλειῶν τὴν γαμηλίαν. For the difficulties of detail which have to be overcome in reconciling the conflicting statements of our authorities see Wyse's Isaeus, p. 358, Toepffer in Pauly-Wissowa I 2676. The word has been derived either (1) from κείρω, as signifying an offering made on cutting the hair, or (2) from κόρος (κούρος). Both derivations appear to have been put forward in antiquity (Suid. s.v., Etym. M. p. 533, 51): for the latter Wyse refers to the Delphic παιδήγῃα. In the absence of more precise evidence it is idle to speculate what bearing this passage has on the significance of the κοῦρειον in primitive times, and whether the animal-victim was the surrogate for a human sacrifice.

¹ So the name is given by Ovid and Apollodorus (2. 44): Hyginus (fab. 64) calls him Agenor. Others consider that the figure represents Andromeda.

² See the contrary view taken by Engelmann in Arch. Jb. XIX 143; but his conclusion is criticized unfavourably by Gruppe in Bursians Jahresh. CXXXVII 394.

22. It is fairly certain that these lines have suffered confusion owing to a dislocation of the original order, and that the displacement was caused by the desire of the scribe to arrange the words according to their grammatical construction: see H. in C. R. xvi 245. Cobet, Coll. Crit. p. 188. But their rearrangement is not so simple a matter, and there are several possibilities from which I have chosen what seems to me the best (see cr. n.). The objections to Scaliger's τοῖσι βαρβάρους Κρόνῳ | θυηπολεῖν βρότειον ἀρχήθεν γένος, apart from the introduction of γένος, are (1) the position of ἀρχήθεν; (2) the distribution of emphasis, which makes it unlikely that νόμος γὰρ ἐστὶ came first. Tucker, who regards ἀρχήθεν as corrupt and thinks that the articles were later additions, proposed: νόμος γὰρ ἐστὶ βαρβάρους θυηπολεῖν | <θῆος> βρότειον, αἰρεθὲν γέρας Κρόνῳ.—ἀρχήθεν: for the history of this word see the admirable account of Lobeck, Phryn. p. 93, who shows that it and other -θεν forms, after failing to establish themselves in Attic, became fairly common in late Greek. The only objection to the word, apart from its position in the sentence, is the statement in Bekk. anecd. p. 421, 5 οὐκ ἐστὶ παρὰ τοῖς Ἀττικοῖς πλὴν παρ' Αἰσχύλῳ (fr. 416 N.). παρ' Ἡρόδοτῳ δὲ ἐστὶ καὶ τοῖς Ἰωσι. But it would be dangerous to refuse the word to Sophocles on this ground alone.—γέρας is the certain correction of Buttman (γένος Scaliger, θέρος Gomperz). For sacrifice as a γέρας of the god cf. Aesch. Cho. 256, Achaëus fr. 2, Tr. fr. adesp. 118.—In spite of the frequent occurrence of human sacrifice in the Greek legends, it is always spoken of in literature as something abhorrent to Greek feeling and only suitable to barbarians: cf. Eur. I. T. 464 δέξαι θυσίας, | ἄδ' οὐ παρ' ἡμῖν νόμος οὐχ ἄστας... ἀναφαίνει. See Stengel, Kultusaltert. 2 p. 114 ff. The Greeks identified Cronos with Moloch to whom the Phoenicians sacrificed children: Diodor. 13. 86, 20. 14. [Plat.] Alin. 315 c. Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 254. For possible traces of human sacrifice in festivals of Κρόνια and Saturnalia see Gruppe in Bursians Jahrb. cxxxvii 544 ff. Frazer, G. B. 111 147 ff. E. B. Tylor, Primitive Culture, 11 p. 398. There is an article by the present writer on Human Sacrifice (Greek) in the Encyclopaedia of Religion and Ethics.

127

ἵπποισιν ἢ κύμβαισι ναυστολεῖς χθόνα;

127 Athen. 481 E ὅτι δὲ καὶ πλοῖον ἢ κύμβη, Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἀνδρομέδᾳ φησὶν 'ἵπποισιν...χθόνα;' Eustath. II. p. 1205, 56 τοιοῦτον καὶ Σοφοκλέους τὸ 'ἵπποισιν...χθόνα,' τοῦτέστιν ἱππότης ἦκει ἢ διὰ πλοῖον: Phot. lex. p. 187, 3 κύμβη· πλοῖον εἶδος Σοφοκλῆς.

The words may be taken to have been addressed to Perseus, but hardly by Andromeda, who must have seen him arrive. But whether the occasion was the banquet which some of the authorities describe as part of the sequel, cannot be determined: see Introductory Note. Petersen attributes the line to Phineus, who, he thinks, might well have used an affected style of utterance. The meaning is correctly given by Eustathius, who, quoting the passage for another purpose, is here independent of Athenaeus. There is thus an instance ofzeugma, since ναυστολεῖς does not fit ἵπποισιν: cf. Eur.

Bacch. 687 ὠνόμενας κρατῆρι καὶ λωτοῦ πόφῳ, Aesch. Prom. 21 ἵν' οὐτε φωνῇ οὐτε του μορφῇ βροτῶν | ὄψῃ, Cope on Arist. rhét. 1. 4. 6.—κύμβασι is probably not a native Greek word. Athenaeus here adds that κύμβα for a cup was said by Apollodorus to be a Paphian word. Cf. Plin. n. h. 7. 208 cymbas Phoenices (invenierunt). Torr, Ancient Ships, p. 112 f., not only holds that the use of κύμβα indicates that a Phoenician vessel is meant, but also that ἵπποι was the name given to Phoenician merchant-ships bearing a horse as figure-head. He quotes Strabo 99 (a figure-head recognized as belonging to Gades) τούτων γὰρ τοὺς μὲν ἐμπόρους μέγαλα στέλλειν πλοῖα, τοὺς δὲ πένητας μικρά, ἃ καλεῖν ἵππους ἀπὸ τῶν ἐν ταῖς πύρραις ἐπισήμων, and refers to Hom. Δ 708 and other passages where ships are compared to horses. But this ingenious interpretation is hardly convincing.—χθόνα is, of course, acc. termini, not, as L. and S. strangely suggest, of space traversed: cf. Eur. Med. 682. It is surprising that E. Mueller, quoted by Hartung, should have taken the use of ναυστολεῖν to be evidence of the satyric character of the play.

128

μηδὲν φοβεῖσθαι προσφάτους ἐπιστολάς

128 Phryn. epit. p. 374 Lob. (CCCL Ruth.) πρόσφατον· καὶ περὶ τούτου πολλὴν διατριβὴν ἐποιήσαμην, ἐπισκοπούμενος εἰ μὴ οὐκ ἔστι λέγεσθαι 'πρόσφατος νεκρός' (Hdt. 2. 89 etc.) καὶ μὴ 'πρόσφατον πρᾶγμα.' εὐρίσκειτο δὲ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν τῇ 'Ἀνδρομέδῃ' τίθει οὕτω· 'μηδὲν...ἐπιστολάς.'

Rutherford preferred the variant φοβεῖσθε, and there is nothing to decide for one as against the other. Naber plausibly suggested that the words μηδὲν φοβεῖσθαι are part of Phrynichus' statement, and do not belong to Sophocles at all; but in that case some alteration of the text would be necessary.

It is curious that Phrynichus should have had so much difficulty in finding an example of πρόσφατος in the meta-phorical sense, which, as Lobeck points out, is fairly common. It should, however, be observed that the metaphor is vigorous in Aesch. Cho. 800 λύσασθ' αἷμα πρόσφατοις δίκαις, and in Pind. Pyth. 4. 299 εὖρε παγὰν ἀμβροσίῳ ἐπέων | πρόσφατον ὅθῃα ξενωθείς, of fresh water, where all the editors take πρόσφατον as an adverb, although Lobeck had indicated the true view. So in Dem. 21. 112 πρόσφατος is contrasted with ἔωλα καὶ ψυχρά, but in Lys. 18. 19 ἐτι τῆς ὀργῆς οὐσης πρόσφατον the metaphor is full-grown. Even to Zeno and the Stoics, who defined λέπῃ as δόξα πρόσφατος κακοῦ παρουσίας (fr. 143 of my ed., 1 212 Arn.), the metaphor was probably still living. In later Greek it became worn-out: see Holden on Plut. Them. 24.

129

ἰδοὺ δὲ φοῖνιον
μάσθλητα δίγονον

129 ἰδοὺ δὲ φοῖνιον Brunck: ἰδοὺ δὲ φοινῶν Etym. M., δίδου δαφινῶν Iex. Sabbat.

129 Etym. M. p. 272, 5 δίγονος μάσθλης· διπλοῦς ἱμάς· ἥ ὅτι οὐ μόνον κατὰ τὴν βαφὴν τῇ τοιοῦτος, ἀλλὰ καὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος ἐκέχρωστο. Σοφοκλῆς 'Ἀνδρομέδῃ' 'ἰδοὺ...δίγονον.' ἐκ τοῦ ῥητορικοῦ· ὁ δὲ χρῶμασι κεχρωμένος. An abbreviated form of this note appears in Hesych. 1 p. 303 δίγονος μάσθλης· ὁ διπλοῦς, ἡ δυσὶ χρώμασι κεχρωμένος (κεχρημένος cod., κεχρωμένος Musurus): if Campbell had referred to Etym. M., he would not have proposed ἱμάσι κεχρημένος in Hesych. Hesych. III p. 73 μάσθλη καὶ μάσθλης· δέρμα καὶ ὑπόδημα φοινικοῦν. καὶ ἡνία, διφθέρα. μάσθλητας (μάσθλη τὰς cod.) τομουτὰς (τομοῦς· τὰς Wecklein) ἡνίας.

καὶ γὰρ ἡ μάσθλη (μάσθλη Bruno Keil). Σοφοκλῆς Ἀνδρομέδα καὶ Σενδείπνοις. For the last extract see fr. 571. The quotation, without lemma or explanation, is found in lex. Sabbat. p. 50, 18.

μάσθλητα δίγονον had received two traditional explanations, (1) as a double lash, (2) as a lash stained with blood in addition to its original colour. We need not hesitate to prefer the former, which is established by Αἰ. 241 μέγαν ἰπποδέτην ῥυτῆρα λαβὼν | παῖε λιγυρὰ μᾶστιγι διπλῇ. It appears from the epithet λιγυρὰ that Sophocles understood the Homeric μᾶστιξ as a whip rather than a goad: see Λ. 532. Notwithstanding the contrary opinions of Verrall and Tucker (on Theb. 595), it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that διπλῇ μᾶστιγι in Ιγ. 647, and διπλῆς παράγνης in Cho. 374, refer to a double lash, and that Leaf (on Ψ 387) is mistaken in extending the inference which he draws from Homeric usage to the language of the tragedians. On the other hand, it will be observed that these passages do not relate to the driving of chariots, and it is certain that goads (El. 718, Eum. 156, Eur. Hipp. 1194, I. A. 220, Phoen. 182, Her. 881, 949) with a double point (O. T. 809) were employed for that purpose. The only passage in tragedy where it might plausibly be urged that μᾶστιξ = κέντρον is Αἰ. 1233; and there Jebb renders it whip. Herwerden (Alnem. xvii 265) proposed δίγονον, not without reason; for there is nothing in the use of δίγονος, τρίγονος, διφυής, etc. which supports their extension to other than natural multiplication.

130

αὐτοχειλέσι ληκύθοις

130 Pollux 10. 120 Σοφοκλῆς δ' ἐν Ἀνδρομέδῃ αὐτοχειλέσι ληκύθοις (λίθοις cod. C) ἔφη, ἡλῶν ἀλαβάστους μονολίθους.

Hemsterhuis conjectured αὐτολίθοις ληκύθοις, and Wakefield αὐτοκόλλοις ληκύθοις; but there is no ground for these suspicions. αὐτοχειλέσι indicates that the rim of the flask or pot was of the same material as the rest of the vessel. It was the custom to gild the edges of silver cups, or to cover horn with silver: cf. Aesch. fr. 185 ἀργυρολάτοις | κέρασι χρυσᾷ στόμῳ προσβεβλημένους, quoted by Athen. 476 C. Similarly Theopompus ἐν δευτέρῃ Φιλιππικῶν (FGH i 285 ap. Athen. l. c. D) says that the kings of the Paeonians τῶν βοῶν τῶν παρ' αὐτοῖς γινομένων μεγάλα κέρατα φινύτων, ὡς χωρεῖν τρεῖς καὶ τέταρτα χόας, ἐκπώματα ποιεῖν ἐξ αὐτῶν, τὰ χεῖλη περιαγρυρῶντας καὶ χρυσοῦντας.

But the practice was as old as Homer: δ 615 δώσω τοι κρητῆρα τετυγμένον. ἀργύρεος δὲ | ἔστιν ἅπας, χρυσῷ δ' ἐπὶ χεῖλεα κεκράνται, ib. 132. Thus the compound means 'with natural rims,' and the whole phrase is exactly parallel to αὐτοκόμπα βέλη in Aesch. Cho. 163, weapons whose hilt is in one piece with the blade. Similar are αὐτοκτίτους: δόμοις fr. 332, αὐτοπέτρον βήματος O. C. 193, αὐτόξυλον γ' ἐκπώμα Phil. 35, and other instances quoted in the n. on Eur. Hel. 356.—αὐτοχειλέσι is the regular accentuation, as Blaydes points out: see Chandler, § 698 ff. But Nauck and Dindorf print αὐτοχειλέσι, following. I suppose, the tradition in Pollux.

Observe that the words form an ordinary glyconic line.

131

ἀμφίπρυμνον πλοῖον

131 Hesych. i p. 164 ἀμφίπρυμνον πλοῖον· ἐκατέρωθεν πρύμναις ἔχον. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀνδρομέδα. καὶ τὰ ἐπὶ σωτηρίᾳ πελωπόμενα πλοῖα. The last clause is unintelligible, and neither Musurus's πεμπόμενα nor M. Schmidt's στόλῳ ἐπόμενα throws any light on the mystery. Luebeck (Pauly-Wissowa i 1953) thinks that boats like our Life-Boats are meant.

ἀμφίπρυμνον. This adjective is applied to vessels which for various reasons were so constructed that they could be propelled in either direction without turning. Dio Cass. 74. 11, describing the siege of Byzantium by Septimius Severus: καὶ τινα αὐτῶν (πλοίων) ἐκατέρωθεν καὶ ἐκ τῆς πρύμνης καὶ ἐκ τῆς πρῆρας πηδάλιους ἤσκητο...ὅπως αὐτοὶ μὴ ἀναστρεφόμενοι καὶ ἐπιπλέωσι καὶ ἀναχωρῶσι, καὶ τοὺς ἐναντίους καὶ ἐν τῷ πρόσπλῳ καὶ ἐν τῷ ἀπόπλῳ σφῶν σφάλλωσι. Germanicus built such boats for his campaign: Tac. Ann. 4. 6 pluies adpositis utrinque gubernaculis, converso ul repente remigio hinc vel illinc adpellerent. They were also used by the Germans (Tac. German. 44) and by the inhabitants of the coasts of the Euxine (Hist. 3. 47). Athen. 204 A, mentions certain vessels of Ptolemy Philopator, one of these a state barge, which he describes as διπρωροι καὶ διπρυνμοι; and it is inferred that they also were of this kind, although Schweighäuser thought otherwise (vol. XI p. 232 on 489 B, where a διπρωρος is compared to a cup παρακειμένως ἔχοντα τὰ ὄτα). I take this opportunity of remarking, in view of the explanations still given in some books, that the meaning of ἀμφήρες δόρυ in Eur. Cycl. 15 and ἀκάτιον ἀμφηρικόν in Thuc. 4. 67 is fixed by the schol. on the latter passage (ἐν ᾧ ἕκαστος τῶν ἐλαυνόντων δικωπιᾷ ἐρέττει); they were sculling-boats, and were named ἀμφήρη because each one of the crew propelled the vessel on both sides. See also Blaydes on Ar. Ecc. 1091. Is it possible that the κήτος was compared to an ἀμφίπρυνμον πλοῖον, because he could so readily shift himself to meet an attack from any quarter? He is compared to a ship rushing through the waves in Ov. Met. 4. 706. [I have since learnt that the suggestion has been anticipated for the same reason by Petersen: see Introductory Note.]

132

ἀμβλύσκει

132 Hesych. I p. 141 ἀμβλύσκει· ἐξαμβλοῖ (ἐξαπλοῖ cod.: corr. Salmassius) κυρίως δὲ ἐπὶ ἀμπέλου. καὶ ἐκτιτρώσκει. ^{μδ}

Σοφοκλῆς Ἀνδρομέδα (ἀνδρο cod.).

M. Schmidt maintained that the form ἀμβλύσκει was an error, and that either ἀμβλίσκει (Plat.) or ἀμβλώσκει (Suid.) should be substituted. Lobeck, Phryn. p. 210, refused to condemn ἀμβλύσκει as a possible derivative from ἀμβλύς; and the evidence does not warrant a dogmatic conclusion. All we can say is that ἀμβλίσκει and ἐξαμβλοῖ are the best-attested forms, and that ἐκτιτρώσκει is Ionic and Hellenistic. Both Lobeck and Rutherford (p. 289) make the strange mistake of assigning ἐκτιτρώσκει to Sophocles on the strength of the above passage of Hesychius. But it is obviously part of the explanation attached to ἀμβλύσκει (or ἀμβλίσκει). Cf. Hesych. II p. 115 ἐξαμβλοῦμεν (?)· ἐκτιτρώσκομεν. Suid. ἐξαμβλίσκει· ἐκτιτρώσκει.

133

ζευξίλεως

133 Hesych. II p. 256 ζευξίλεως· ζευκτὸς λαὸς (ζευκτὴς λαοῦ Ellendt), ἢ ὃ ὑπεζευγμένοι εἰσὶ λαοί. Σοφοκλῆς (σοφῶς cod.) Ἀνδρομέδα. Cf. Phot. lex. p. 53, 8 (=Suid. s.v. ζευξίλεως) ζευξίλεως· ὃ ὑπεζευγμένοι εἰσὶν οἱ λαοί. Eustath. II. p. 401, II ζευξίλεως εἴρηται παρὰ τοῖς μεθ' Ὀμηρον ὁ βασιλεὺς.

The description refers to an oriental despotism, where the subjects were crushed beneath the yoke of slavery:

Isocr. 4. 151 τὰς δὲ ψυχὰς διὰ τὰς μοναρχίας ταπεινὰς καὶ περιδεῖς ἔχοντες. Plat. Menex. 240 A αἱ δὲ γυνῆαι δεδουλωμέναι πάντων ἀνθρώπων ἦσαν, ibid. C Ἀθηναίους ἐν τῇ αὐτῇ ταύτῃ ἀνάγκῃ ζεύξαντας Ἑρετριεῖσιν ἄγειν. Aesch. Pers. 594 οὐδ' ἐτι γλῶσσαι βροτοῖσιν | ἐν φυλακαῖς λέλυται γὰρ | λαὸς ἐλεύθερα βάζει, | ὡς ἐλύθη ζυγὸν ἀλκᾶς. For the metaphor in general see Jebb on Al. 24.

134

οιήτας

134 Phot. lex. p. 317, 7 οιήτας· τοὺς κωμήτας. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀνδρομέδῃ. Hesych. III p. 182 οιήτῶν· κωμητῶν (οιατῶν· κομητῶν cod.) οἶαι (οἶ cod.) γὰρ αἱ κῶμαι. ibid. p. 183 οἰητῶν· κωμητῶν (κομητῶν cod.).

The word οἶη for a village occurs in Apoll. Rhod. 2. 138 πέρθοντο γὰρ ἡμὲν ἀλῶαι | ἡδ' οἶαι τῆμος δῆψ ὑπὸ δαυρί Λύκουο.

It corresponds to the Laconian ὠβά, a local division of the country (Gilbert, Staatsalt. p. 45), in which β appears to represent φ. See Curtius, Gr. Ét. II p. 214 E. tr.: but the connexion with ἰαῶν is inadmissible. Oea was the name of an Attic deme (O. C. 1061, with Jebb's n.), and also a place-name in Thera.

135

σάρητον

135 Hesych. IV p. 6 σαλητόν· Σοφοκλῆς Ἀνδρομέδῃ. Ἀντίπατρος (ἀντί πατρός ἢ cod. A grammarian of this name is mentioned in schol. Ar. Av. 1403) βαρβαρικὸν χιτῶνα. οἱ δὲ καὶ μεσόλευκον αὐτὸν εἶναι φασί. See however ibid. p. 11 σάρητον· ὁ καὶ σάραπις, εἶδος χιτῶνος. And this form is supported by Phot. lex. p. 501, 24 σάρητον· βαρβαρικὸς χιτῶν. Cf. Hesych. IV p. 10 σάραπις· Περσικὸς χιτῶν μεσόλευκος, ὡς Κτησίας. Poll. 7. 61 ὁ δὲ σάραπις, Μῆδων τὸ φόρημα, πορφυροῖς μεσόλευκος χιτῶν. Phot. lex. p. 500, 7 σάραπις· χιτῶν Περσικὸς μεσόλευκος. Democr. Ephes. (FHG IV 383) ap. Athen.

525 C σάραπις μῆλινοι καὶ πορφυροὶ καὶ λευκοί, οἱ δὲ ἀλουργεῖς.

Such a tunic was part of the royal apparel of the Persian king: Xen. Cyr. 8. 3. 13 ὁρθὴν ἔχων τὴν τιάραν καὶ χιτῶνα πορφυροῦν μεσόλευκον, — ἄλλω δ' οὐκ ἔξεστι μεσόλευκον ἔχειν. It was adopted by Alexander when he assumed the Persian dress: Athen. 537 E, Plut. Alex. 51 (where διάλευκος is used for μεσόλευκος). Elsewhere we find it worn by upstarts and imposters, such as Lysias the Epicurean philosopher who became tyrant of Tarsus (Athen. 215 C), or Alexander the false prophet in Lucian Alex. 11.

136

Πᾶνες

136 Schol. Theocr. 4. 62 τοὺς σατύρους πλείους φησὶν, ὡς καὶ τοὺς Σελινοὺς καὶ Πᾶνας, ὡς Αἰσχύλος μὲν ἐν Γλαύκῳ (fr. 35), Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Ἀνδρομέδῃ.

So the extract is given by Nauck, without stating his authority. Duebner gives the opening words as τοὺς σατύρους οἱ πλείονές φασιν, and notes that EU have καὶ σατυρίσκους τοὺς Πᾶνας οἱ πλείους φασίν, ὡς καὶ τοὺς Σελινοὺς καὶ τοὺς σατύρους. Dindorf prints τοὺς σατύρους ἀκρατεῖς οἱ πλείονές φασιν, where the addition of ἀκρατεῖς is due to a conjecture of Casaubon. Nauck inferred that Sophocles spoke of Sileni in the plural on the ground that the authority of Aeschylus is quoted, as other evidence shows, for the existence of two Pans. But he subsequently admitted (Index, p. xi) that the true solution had been found by Wecklein (Sitzungs. d. K. B. Akad. 1890 I p. 31), and that we ought to read τοὺς Πᾶνας... σατύρους, as printed in Ahrens's and Ziegler's editions. The passage in Theocritus runs: τό ται γένος ἡ Σατυρίσκους | ἐγγύθεν ἡ Πάνεσσιν κακοκράμοισιν ἐρίσσει. So soon as we consider what comment is likely to have been made on these words requiring the citation of parallels, it becomes clear that the editor, possibly Theon himself, was defending the use of Πᾶνες in the plural by Theocritus.

The alternative offered by Casaubon's restoration would be inconsistent with the quotation from Aeschylus. Pan was acknowledged by Herodotus (2. 145) to be one of the youngest of the Greek gods, and his name hardly appears in literature before the fifth century B.C. It seems highly probable that the generic use of the name is actually the earlier, and that Pan the god is developed and individualized from the class of demonic beings with whom the rustic fancy populated the hills and forests of Arcadia. The same history has been deduced for the parallel conception of the Italian Faunus: see Warde Fowler, Roman Festivals, p. 260. For other early evidence of the plural cf. Ar. Ecc. 1069 ὦ Πάνες, Plat. leg. 815 C Νόμφας τε καὶ Πάνας καὶ Σιληνοὺς καὶ Σατύρους ἐπονυμάζοντες. The Panisci, parallel to σατυρίσκοι, are not mentioned before Cicero (n. d. 3. 43), but this is probably accidental. See also A. P. 6. 108 ὑψηλῶν ὀρέων ἑφόροι, κεραοὶ, χοροπαίκται, | Πάνες, βουχίλου κράντορες Ἀρκαδίας. Prop. 3. 17. 34. Pausan. 8. 37. 2.

ΑΝΤΗΝΟΡΙΔΑΙ

The following extract from Strabo (608) is usually referred to the Antenoridae. 'Sophocles says that at the capture of Troy a leopard's skin was placed in front of the door of Antenor, to serve as a warning that the house was to remain unscathed. Accordingly, Antenor and his sons, together with the Eneti who had joined them, found their way in safety to Thrace, and thence escaped to the country called Ænetica on the Adriatic. Then also Aeneas, together with his father Anchises and his son Ascanius, collected his followers and set sail¹. The leopard's skin was also mentioned in the Locrian Ajax (fr. 11). Pausanias (10. 27. 3), describing the picture of Polygnotus in the Lesche at Delphi, which set forth the incidents belonging to the capture of Troy, referred to the house of Antenor, with its leopard's skin over the entrance; in front of it were represented Antenor and his wife Theano (Hom. Z 298), with their sons Glaucus and Eurymachus, and their daughter Crino and her infant. The leopard's skin is mentioned in the same connexion by schol. Pind. Pyth. 5. 110.

In the same account (10. 26. 7, 8) Pausanias states that Lesches in the Little Iliad (fr. 13 K.) related the rescue by Odysseus of Helicaon, another of Antenor's sons, when wounded in the night-battle; and gives reasons for concluding that his wife Laodice was exempted from the fate of the other Trojan women. Apollodorus (epit. 5. 21) similarly recounts that Odysseus and Menelaus, recognizing Glaucus the son of Antenor, as he was fleeing to his house, saved him by force of arms. Pindar (Pyth. 5. 83) followed the tradition that the Antenoridae settled at Cyrene: ἔχοντι τὰν χαλκοχέρμαι ξένοι | Τρώες Ἀντανορίδαι· σὺν

¹ Strabo is extracted by Eustath. Il. p. 405, 29.

Ἑλένα γὰρ μόλον, | καπνωθεῖσαν πάτρην ἐπεὶ ἴδον. The family was so numerous that its migrations might well have been in more than one direction. Bacchylides spoke of them as fifty: schol. Hom. Ω 496 πιθανὸν μίαν τεκεῖν ἰθ', οὐχ ὥς Βακχυλίδης ν' τῆς Θεανοῦς ὑπογράφει παῖδας. Homer names eleven: besides Coon, Demoleon, Iphidamas, Laodamas, and Pedaeus, who were killed, Acamas, Agenor, Archelochus, Helicaon, Laodocus, and Polybus¹; and Verg. Aen. 6. 483 has Glaucumque Medontaque Thersilochumque, | tris Antenoridas, though these three are not so specified in Homer P 216. A few other names besides those which have been already mentioned appear in later writers.

The reasons which induced the Greeks to accord a special protection to Antenor are recorded in Qu. 13. 291ff. and more briefly in Tryphiod. 656 ff. τέκνα δὲ καὶ γενεὴν Ἀντήνορος ἀντιθέοιο | Ἀτρεΐδης ἐφύλαξε, φιλοξείνοιο γέροντος, | μελιχίη. προτέρης τίνων χάριν, ἥδ' ἐτραπέζης | κείνης, ἣ μιν ἔδεκτο γυνὴ πρηνεὶα Θεανώ. Cf. Tzetz. Posthom. 741 ff. οἶον μὲν Ἀντήνορος εἰρύσαντο γενέθλην | Ἀργεῖοι ξενίης μνήμην φορέοντες ἐκείνου, | παρδαλέην προθύροις ἀρίγνωτον σῆμα βαλόντες. He had entertained Menelaus and Odysseus, when they came to Troy to demand the restoration of Helen (Hom. Γ 207), and protected them from injury (schol. ad loc.). He was the leader of the peace-party among the Trojans, and had recommended the surrender of Helen and her treasure (H 347 ff.; cf. Hor. Ep. 1. 2. 9); and his honied speech was compared to that of Nestor: εἴ μοι τὸ Νεστόρειον εὐγλωσσον μέλος; | Ἀντήνορός τε τοῦ Φρυγὸς δοίη θεός (Eur. fr. 899).

The tradition that Troy fell in consequence of the treachery of Antenor has not been traced to any early writer²; and there is no evidence to show that Sophocles was acquainted with it.

It is generally admitted that the passage in Strabo contains a summary in brief of the plot of the *Antenoridae*³; for otherwise the allusion cannot be traced to its source. It is scarcely to be referred to the Locrian Ajax; for the incidents related by Strabo, if included in the action, would have been incompatible with the dramatic development of the fate of Ajax. There is, moreover, a play of Accius with the same title; and it is unreasonable to doubt that it was adapted from Sophocles (Ribbeck, Röm. Trag. p. 406 ff.). The Latin fragments are more plentiful than the

¹ Jebb, Bacchyl. p. 221, who mentions only ten, has omitted Laodamas (O 516).

² It appears first in Lycophr. 340, where see Holzinger. Wagner in Pauly-Wissowa I 2352 thinks that it was a late invention.

³ Bergk, however, in his early work on the Fragments (de frag. Soph. p. 3), dissented, holding that the substance of Strabo's reference was drawn from the Locrian Ajax. But he failed to give a satisfactory account of the Antenoridae, which, on the strength of the fragments of Accius, he guessed to contain the arrival of Rhesus.

Greek, and in at least one important particular they assist in enlarging our conception of the plot. From the story as outlined above we receive no impression of a dramatic conflict. Antenor was saved by the Greeks in consideration of his past services, and that is all. But Accius has: ad populum intellego | referendum, quoniam horum aequiter sententiae | fuere (fr. 1). From this it was inferred by Welcker that the Greek view in favour of Antenor was by no means unanimous, and that he was saved from destruction only after a protracted conflict¹. What may have been the arguments on the one side or the other we have no means of ascertaining; but the association of Antenor with the Eneti is a circumstance which perhaps bore nearly on the issue. In Homer this people are a Paphlagonian tribe (B 852) under the leadership of Pylaemenes, and are reckoned among the Trojan allies; but the fragments of Accius led Welcker to conclude (p. 169) that a new leader had arrived with a fresh contingent of Eneti just before the capture of the city: namque huc em venio ut mea ope opes Troiae integrem (fr. IV); qui aut illorum copias | fundam in campo, aut navis uram, aut castra mactabo in mare (fr. V).

It will be noticed that, according to Strabo, Sophocles recognised the connexion of Antenor with the settlement of Eneti (Veneti) in the north of Italy. We thus get an interesting link with the Latin authorities: Liv. 1. 1 iam primum omnium satis constat, Troia capta, in ceteros saevitum esse Troianos; duobus, Aenea Antenoreque, et vetusti iure hospitii et quia pacis reddendaeque Helenae semper auctores fuerunt, omne ius belli Achivos abstinuisse, casibus deinde variis Antenorem cum multitudine Henetum, qui, seditione ex Paphlagonia pulsi, et sedes et ducem, rege Pylaemene ad Troiam amisso, quaerebant, venisse in intimum maris Hadriatici sinum, Euganeisque qui inter mare Alpesque incolebant pulsus, Henetos Troianosque eas tenuisse terras: et in quem primum egressi sunt locum Troia vocatur, pagoque inde Troiano nomen est, gens universa Veneti adpellati. Cf. Verg. Aen. 1. 242 ff. Further confirmation of Strabo's evidence is to be found in Polyb. 2. 17. 6, who asserts that the tragic playwrights told strange stories respecting the settlement of the Veneti (περὶ ὧν οἱ τραγῳδιογράφοι πολὺν τινα πεποιήνται λόγον καὶ πολλὰν διατίθενται τερατείαν): in customs and dress, according to him, these people closely resemble the Celts, but differ from them in language. Strabo elsewhere (48, 150, 543) mentions the settlement of Antenor and the Eneti as a common tradition, and in 212 appeals in support of it to the fact that Dionysius of Syracuse recruited his racing stable from Venetia, recalling the line in Homer (Il.) which connected the Paphlagonian Eneti with ἡμιόνων γένος ἀγροτεράων (cf. Eur. Hipp. 231). For the trade route between the Black Sea and the Adriatic see Ridgeway, Early Age in Greece, I p. 366. According to him, the Veneti were Illyrians, i.e. Pelasgians belonging to the melanochrous dolichocephalous race indigenous in the Mediterranean (ib. p. 377).

¹ Ribbeck (p. 408) interprets differently. According to him, the reference is to a decision of the Trojan people, after the council had been equally divided on the question whether a last attempt should be made to secure a friendly arrangement by the surrender of Helen after the death of Paris; and here Antenor, as on earlier occasions, was the advocate of peace. This seems less likely. Ahrens thought that, though Antenor's life was spared, his treachery was condemned, and he was refused permission to settle in the Troad. Therefore he was sent away with the Eneti, who, owing to the lateness of their arrival, would feel no resentment against him.

The omission of the Laocoon and the inclusion of the Antenoridae in the list of Trojan plays given in the Argument to the Ajax (p. 3, ed. Jebb) suggested to Robert (Bild und Lied, p. 201) the identification of the two titles; but he recognized that there was much to be said on the other side. Fr. 373, as compared with Strabo 608, indicates that the departure of Aeneas may have been mentioned in both plays.

The fourteenth poem of Bacchylides is entitled Ἀντηνωρίδαι ἢ Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις. Theano opens the door of Athena's temple in order to receive Menelaus and Odysseus on their embassy; and it is evident, in spite of a lacuna, that they are conducted by the sons of Antenor, who goes himself to inform Priam. The Trojans are summoned to the agora, and pray to the gods for a cessation of their sufferings. The debate is opened by Menelaus with a brief warning that Zeus is not the author of men's troubles; δίκη lies within the choice of all, while ὕβρις, her opposite, leads to ruin and destruction. At this point the ode abruptly ends. Jebb (p. 220) remarks: 'Blass and Wilamowitz regard the double title of the Bacchylidean poem as making it probable that the Ἀντηνωρίδαι of Sophocles was only another name for his Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις. Such a second title for the tragedy is intelligible, however, only if the sons of Antenor formed the chorus; but, in the case of such a drama, is that probable?' It may be added that, if this identification were accepted, it would be necessary to find another solution for the title Ἑλένης ἀρπαγή mentioned in the Argument to the Ajax in place of the current hypothesis that it is an error for Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις.

137

ὄρνιθα καὶ κήρυκα καὶ διάκονον

137 Athen. 373 C, D ἐπὶ δὲ τοῦ ἀρσενικοῦ οὐ μόνον ὄρνιν ἀλλὰ καὶ ὄρνιθα... καὶ Σοφοκλῆς Ἀντηνορίδαις 'ὄρνιθα... διάκονον.'

The reference underlying this quotation is obscure. (1) Hartung suggests that ὄρνιθα = οἰστέ, as in O. T. 52 (Febb): see also on Eur. Hel. 1051. Some slight confirmation may be drawn from the fact that Aesch. fr. 95 is quoted by Athenaeus directly afterwards. (2) Ellendt holds that ὄρνιθα is the eagle. He is presumably thinking of the rape of Ganymede, and of such passages as Pind. Isth. 6. 50. So apparently Blaydes, who renders καὶ κήρυκα 'both as herald.'

138

ἀφεψιασάμην

138 Hesych. i p. 334 ἀφεψιασάμην· ἀφωμίλησα. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀντηνορίδαις (ἀντηνορίδαις cod.). Bekk. apocd. p. 470, 13 ἀφεψιαμῖν· ἀφωμίλησα. οὕτω Σοφοκλῆς. Eustath. Od. p. 1831, 3 ἀφεψιασάμην ἦτοι ἀφωμίλησα, ὥς ἐν ῥητορικῇ κείναι λεξικῶ (Ael. et Paus. fr. 389 Schwabe, who however prints ἐφεψιασάμην without comment).

For this word and its cognates see on fr. 3. ἐφεψιάσθαι occurs in Hom. τ 331, 370, καθεψιάσθαι ib. 372, and the simple verb in ρ 530 and the Alexandrian poets.

139

ἐκβαβράζει

139 ἐκβαβράζει cod.: corr. H

139 Hesych. ii p. 40 ἐκβαβράζει· ἐκσαλεύσαι. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀντηνορίδαις (ἐν τῇ νορίδαις cod.).

There appears to be something wrong with the tradition: M. Schmidt conj. ἐκάμαζε· ἐσάλευσε, but a simpler and more attractive remedy was Pearson's ἐκκαλῆσαι for ἐκσαλεύσαι. Hesych. i p. 349 has βαβάζειν· τὸ <μῆ> διτηθρωμένα λέγειν. ἐνιοὶ δὲ βοᾶν, and several scholars support εἰ μὴ βαβάζει γ' in Ar. Av. 1681. Cf. βαβάκτης (Cratinus) and βάβαξ (Archilochus). But Hesych. l.c. has also βαβράζων· κεκραγῶς συντόνωσι, and this is supported by Ananius (fr. 5) ap. Athen. 182 B ὅταν θέρος τ' ἡ κήχεται βαβράζωσιν, of chirruping crickets.

H., however, thought that ἐκσαλεύσαι was sound, and restored ἐκβαβράζει with the sense 'to toss up as the sea does, or boiling water.' He relied on the use of βράσσω, βράζω and βρύζω, and held that βαβράζω was related to βρύζω as παφλάζω to φλόζω, καχλάζω to κλύζω. The association with sound (βρυχάομαι etc.) is paralleled by περιβρύχιος (schol. Ant. 336). For ἐκσαλεύσαι = 'to shake out' see Suid. ἐκσάλευσον αὐτό. ἐξένεγκον, Ar. Lys. 1028 (where ἐκσάλευσον is now read), and ἐκσαλάσσω in A.P. 5. 135.

ATPEYΣ H MYKHNAIAI

This play cannot be considered apart from the title Thyestes (p. 185). There is surprisingly little evidence for the existence of an Atræus: Hesychius quotes Ἀτρεὶς ἡ Μυκηνναίαις, and a scholiast on Euripides refers to Μυκηνναίαις. The Thyestes is quoted twenty-two times, for the most part simply under that title; but Hesychius refers four times to Θυέστης Σικυώνιος, once to Θυέστης ὁ ἐν Σικυῶνι, and twice to Θυέστης δεύτερος, and Orion cites ἐκ τοῦ α' Θυέστου. On these facts it has generally been held that Sophocles wrote three plays dealing with the gruesome legends concerning the two brothers; that the famous incidents of the golden lamb and the Thyestes-feast occurred in the Atræus; and that the plays entitled Thyestes related to the unnatural intercourse of Thyestes with his daughter, and the fatal issue by which Aegisthus became the appointed avenger of his father (Welcker, pp. 357—370). The problem is unusually intricate, and it is hardly possible from the existing data to ascertain which parts of the traditional material were selected by Sophocles for treatment. The fragments themselves, with the possible exception of fr. 247, which seems to refer to the Sicyon-story, do not give any assistance towards the unravelling of the plots; and it is scarcely legitimate to draw any inference from the more numerous fragments of Accius, whose Atræus (Aul. Gell. 13. 2. 2) has been supposed to be an adaptation of Sophocles: see especially the passages quoted by Cic. n. d. 3. 68, de orat. 3. 217, 219. For it must be remembered that Ennius had already written a Thyestes; and, while it is likely that both these Roman tragedies dealt rather with the central motive of the story than with its outlying incidents, we cannot believe that Accius was content simply to reproduce the treatment of Sophocles. Indeed, his known attitude towards his models forbids such a conclusion: it is certain that in his Antigone he departed widely from Sophocles, and his Philoctetes depended on more than one original (Schanz, Röm. Litt. p. 76).

Hitherto it has not been convincingly shown that Sophocles wrote more than two plays upon the story of the brothers, one containing the events which occurred at Mycenæ, and the other the Sicyon-story. Since everyone hearing the name Thyestes at once recalls the banquet, the other part of his story when referred to would naturally be distinguished as happening in Sicyon, even though the banquet-play were known by the title Atræus; and, on the other hand, it would not be unnatural for the banquet-play, whatever its traditional title may have been, to be referred to either as Thyestes or as Atræus. This may be illustrated by Epict. diss. 1. 28. 32 καὶ ποία τραγωδία ἄλλη ἀρχὴν ἔχει; Ἀτρεὺς Εὐριπίδου τί ἐστὶ; τὸ φαινόμενον, which is admitted to be a reference to the Thyestes of Euripides. For the present, however, we may put aside the question of the contents of the play (or plays) entitled Thyestes, except in so far as that title may have been an alternative for Atræus. No one denies that Sophocles wrote a play covering much the same ground as Seneca's Thyestes, whatever its exact title may have been. The general ambit of these plays may be gathered from Dio Chrys. 66. 6 (II p. 162 Arn.) ὅτι μὲν γὰρ διὰ χρυσοῦν πρόβατον ἀνάστατον συνέβη γενέσθαι τηλικαύτην οἰκίαν τὴν Πέλοπος οἱ τραγωδοὶ φασιν. καὶ κατεκίπη μὲν τὰ τοῦ Θυέστου τέκνα, τῇ Πελοπείᾳ δὲ ὁ πατὴρ ἐμίχθη καὶ τὸν Αἰγίσθον ἔσπειρεν...τούτους δὲ οὐκ ἄξιον ἀπιστεῖν, ἃ γέγραπται μὲν οὐχ ὑπὸ τῶν τυχόντων ἀνδρῶν, Εὐριπίδου καὶ Σοφοκλέους, λέγεται δὲ ἐν μέσοις τοῖς θεάτροις. We may also infer that the golden lamb was the initial cause of the trouble between the brothers, according to both tragedians, and in this respect they appear to have followed the author of the Alcmaeonis (schol. Eur. Or. 997). Is it possible to obtain a better estimate of the scope of the banquet-play? The answer will depend upon the weight to be assigned to schol. rec. Eur. Or. 812 (Atræus and Thyestes, contending for the throne, agreed that whichever could produce some divine sign should prevail) ἐν τοῖς ποιμνίοις δὲ τοῦ Ἀτρεὺς εἴρηται χρυσοῦν ἀρνίον μῆνιδι Ἑρμοῦ...καὶ μέλλοντος Ἀτρεὺς δεῖξαι τὸ τέρας τοῖς δικασταῖς, καὶ λαβεῖν τὴν ἀρχήν. Ἀερόπη ἡ τούτου γυνὴ μοιχευομένη Θυέστη τῷ ἀνδραδέλφῳ, κλέψασα τοῦτο παρέδωκεν αὐτῷ. Θυέστης δὲ λαβὼν τοῦτο καὶ δείξας τοῖς δικασταῖς, τῆς ἀρχῆς ἐκράτησε. μὴ ἀνασχόμενος οὖν Ἀτρεὺς τὴν συμφορὰν, ἀλλὰ δυσχεραίνων, ὅτι ἀδίκως ἐστέρηται τῆς ἀρχῆς, ὁμοῦ τε τὴν γυναῖκα Ἀερόπην τιμωρεῖται κατ' ἄμφω, καὶ ὅτι ἐμοιχεύετο Θυέστη, καὶ ὅτι κέκλοφε τὸ ἀρνίον καὶ δέδωκεν αὐτῷ, ῥίψας αὐτὴν εἰς θάλασσαν, ὥς φησι Σοφοκλῆς, καὶ τοὺς τρεῖς υἱοὺς τοῦ Θυέστου, Ἀγλαόν, Ὀρχομένον, καὶ Κάλεον, ἀποκτείνας παρέθηκεν εἰς τράπεζαν τῷ πατρί, καὶ αὐτὸν ὕστερον ὑπέκτεινε. δι' ἃ ὁ ἥλιος μὴ στέρξας τὸ παράνομον, μίαν ἡμέραν ἐκ δυσμῶν πρὸς ἑὼ διφρεῖν κτέ. The notion of Atræus and Thyestes submitting their claims to a panel of jurymen is certainly not old, but that the lamb was a mark of divine favour and that its possessor was entitled to claim the succession are propositions so well supported that they are much more likely to belong to the original legend than the variant recorded by Apollod. epit. 2. 10. Cf. Eur. El. 722 τέρας ἐκκομίζει πρὸς δῶματα· νέμενος δ' | εἰς ἀγόρους αὐτεῖ | τὰν κερόεσσαν ἔχειν χρυσεόμαλλον κατὰ δῶμα ποίμναν. Acc. fr. VIII quod mihi

*portento caelestum pater | prodigium misit, regni stabilimen
mei.* Sen. Thyest. 230 possessor huius regnat, hunc cunctae domus | fortuna sequitur. The purport of the reference to Sophocles has been variously estimated. If it is intended for the Atræus, as Dindorf and other scholars thought, we obtain a valuable clue to the construction of that play; but it may be merely an inaccurate reminiscence of Ai. 1295,—if indeed the vulgate text of that passage is not corrupt (see Jebb's n.). Nauck evidently attached no value to the scholium, which he omitted from his edition of the Fragments. There is, however, a further indication in the note, which can almost with certainty be assigned to Sophocles, and which increases the probability that we have here a rough outline of his plot. That is the statement that the alteration of the sun's course was due to the sun-god's horror at the impious feast. For this very thing is mentioned by Statyllius Flaccus in his epigram in honour of Sophocles (A. P. 9. 98): Οἰδίποδες δισσοί σε καὶ Ἡλέκτρη βαρύμηνις | καὶ δείπνοις ἐλαθεῖς Ἀτρεὺς Ἡέλιος κτέ¹. The same version was generally adopted by the Latin poets (see, besides Sen. Thyest. 785 ff., Ov. Her. 16. 205, Am. 3. 12. 39 aversumque diem mensis furialibus Atræi); but it is more important to observe that it also occurs in Hygin. fab. 88, which is connected with Sophocles for other reasons (see p. 185), and in fab. 258. For another tale was current according to which, after Thyestes by his treacherous and shameful plot had temporarily obtained recognition as monarch, Zeus promised to Atræus that the course of nature should be changed in his favour and that he might promise this marvel to the people as a token that he was the rightful heir (Apollod. epit. 2. 12). This was accepted by Euripides (fr. 861 δείξας γὰρ ἀστρων τὴν ἐναντίαν ὁδὸν | δῆμον τ' ἔσφρα καὶ τύραννος ἰζόμεν), and is apparently referred to by Sophocles in fr. 738, where see note. Hence Welcker (p. 361) was undoubtedly mistaken in referring it to some later tragedian. To later rationalists Atræus was an early astronomer: Strabo 23, Lucian de astrol. 12.

It seems clear that Aristotle's allusions to Thyestes in poet. 13.
1453^a 10 etc., whether they relate to Sophocles or to Euripides, concern the banquet-play and not the story of Pelopia.

Welcker thought that Μυκηναῖοι should be restored as the alternative title. The evidence is very slight, but, if the feminine form is correct, it would follow that Aerope was one of the most prominent characters.

¹ The importance of this passage was first pointed out by O. Crusius in Philol.
Suppl. VI 304 sq., but is overlooked by Escher in Fauly-Wissowa II 2143, who refers to it. It is of course possible that the epigrammatist was simply alluding to the story of Atræus in the form most familiar to him.

140

μὰ τὴν ἐκείνου δειλίαν, ἣ βόσκεται, θῆλυς μὲν αὐτός, ἄρσενας δ' ἐχθρούς ἔχων.

140. 2 ἄρσενας (ἀρσενας N) codd.

140 Schol. Eur. Hipp. 307 εἰώθασιν ἐρωτευόμενοι κατὰ τῶν ἐχθρῶν ὁμνῆσαι, ὡς καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Μυκήναις (Μυκήναις AB) 'μὰ... ἔχων.'

'Not so! by the cowardice that is his daily portion,—that man whose heart is a woman's, with men for his foes.' It is important to observe that v. 2 is subordinate to βόσκεται, for the main clause (express or implied) to which μὰ is attached must be negative. In Hipp. l.c. the negative clause is μὴ μετέδοντας δόμων which depends directly upon ἴσθι: 'know that,—however stubbornly you contest it—if you die and abandon your children, they will never receive their inheritance, no! I swear by the Amazon' &c. The construction was correctly explained by Paley, but several editors strangely make προδοῦσα supplementary to ἴσθι, which could only mean 'know that you have abandoned'...—βόσκεται, as usual, implies a certain degree of contempt. Cf. fr. 591 βόσκει δὲ τοὺς μὲν μοῖρα δυσμερίας. R. A. Neil, who examined the history of this word in an excellent note on Ar. Eg. 255, pointed out that it is generally metaphorical in tragedy. See also Cobet, V. L. p. 67.—θῆλυς, of a man: cf. Trach. 1075, Aesch. Cho. 304 θῆλεια γὰρ φρήν (of Aegisthus, who is addressed as γυνή in Ag. 1623). The taunt is well illustrated by Eur. Hclid. 700 αἰσχροὺν γὰρ οἰκουρῆμα γίνεται τόδε, | τοὺς μὲν μάχεσθαι, τοὺς δὲ δειλίᾳ μένειν. The parallel to Aegisthus is so close, that one may suspect that his father Thyestes is referred to. Ribbeck (p. 200) compared this fr. with Ennius Thyest. fr. v, where he supposes Thyestes to repudiate the charge of cowardice.

141

ἐπισπάσει

141 Hesych. II p. 168 ἐπισπάσει ἐπιτεύξεται. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀτρεΐ ἢ Μυκήναις ἐπὶ (ἀπὸ Nauck) τῶν τοῖς λίνοις λαμβανόντων.

The use illustrated is the same as that found in Ai. 769 πέποιθα τοῦτ' ἐπισπάσειν κλέος, where see Jebb. The meaning is to draw in, as a fisherman secures his catch: cf. A. P. 6. 109 καὶ κρυφίον τρικλωστον ἐπισπαστήρα βόλοιο. Solon ap. Plut. Sol. 14 περιβαλὼν δ' ἄγρην ἀγασθεὶς οὐκ ἐπέσπασεν μέγα | δίκτυον. Soph.

fr. 210. 40. Jebb's apology for the use of the active, that it is prompted by metrical considerations, is surely unnecessary. Though the middle naturally tended to assert itself, as the metaphorical meaning became increasingly familiar (see Wyttenbach on Plut. mor. p. 39 A), no objection can be taken to the active, at least so long as its original force remains prominent. The use of φέρειν (e.g. El. 692) is exactly similar.

ΑΧΑΙΩΝ ΣΥΛΛΟΓΟΣ

Until quite recently it was generally held that Ἀχαιῶν σύλλογος and Σύνδευπνοι were alternative titles of the same play; but the reasons which appeared to support that conclusion will be more conveniently considered in connexion with the Σύνδευπνοι. The discovery of fr. 142 has entirely altered the conditions of the problem. The internal evidence of that fragment clearly indicates the story of the play to which it belonged; and, since the language appears to be that of Sophocles, as is pointed out in the notes, the inference drawn by Wilamowitz that it comes from the Ἀχαιῶν σύλλογος can hardly be resisted¹. Not only does no other title seem to fit the data, but the words in col. ii 12 ποῦ 'στι σύλλογος φίλων; are a strong confirmation of the proposed identification. Also ἐξετάζεται in v. 17 may be compared with fr. 144.

The chief interest of the plot lay in the relations of Achilles with Telephus. When the Greeks first sailed to Troy, through ignorance of its real situation they landed in Mysia. Here Telephus, who was king of the country, came out to meet them, and killed Thersander the son of Polynices. But, fleeing before Achilles, he became entangled in a vine-plant, and was wounded by Achilles' spear. The Greeks retired, and were scattered by a storm; Achilles reached Scyros, where he ultimately married Deidamia. At length the confederates assembled for a second time at Argos. Meanwhile Telephus, whose wound refused to heal, had visited Delphi and learnt from the oracle that he could only be cured by the hand which had inflicted the wound (ὁ τρώσας ἰάσεται schol. Ar. Nub. 919). The sequel is described in Procl. Cypr. (EGF p. 19) ἔπειτα Τηλέφον κατὰ μαντείαν παραγενόμενον εἰς Ἄργος ἰάται Ἀχιλλεὺς ὡς ἡγεμόνα γενησόμενον τοῦ ἐπ' Ἴλιον πλοῦ; and more fully in Apollod. epit. 3. 19, 20 συνελθόντων δὲ αὐτῶν ἐν Ἄργει αὐθις μετὰ τὴν ῥηθεῖσαν ὀκταετίαν, ἐν ἀπορίᾳ τοῦ πλοῦ πολλῇ καθεστήκεσαν, καθηγεμόνα μὴ ἔχοντες, ὃς ἦν δυνατὸς δεῖξαι τὴν εἰς Τροίαν. Τηλέφος δὲ ἐκ τῆς Μυσίας, ἀνίατον τὸ τραῦμα ἔχων, εἰπόντος αὐτῷ τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος τότε τεύξεσθαι θεραπείας, ὅταν ὁ τρώσας ἰατρὸς γένηται, τρύχεσιν ἡμφιεσμένος εἰς Ἄργος ἀφίκετο, καὶ δεηθεὶς Ἀχιλλέως καὶ ὑπεσχημένος τὸν εἰς Τροίαν πλοῦν δεῖξαι θεραπεύεται ἀποξύσαντος Ἀχιλλέως τῆς Πηλιάδος μελίας τὸν ἰόν. θεραπευθεὶς οὖν ἔδειξε τὸν πλοῦν, τὸ τῆς δειξέως ἀσφαλὲς πιστουμένου τοῦ Κάλχαντος διὰ τῆς ἑαυτοῦ μαντικῆς.

The story of the healing of Telephus formed the subject of the famous play written by Euripides² under this title and produced in 438 B.C.; and the words τρύχεσιν ἡμφιεσμένος in Apollodorus appear to be due to Euripidean influence (cf. fr. 697, and Nauck, TGF p. 580). The ingenuity of the playwright, in handling the drama, was taxed to solve the dramatic difficulty of converting Telephus, a declared foe, into a trustworthy friend.

¹ Crusius (Lit. Z. 1907. 1310) did not altogether approve of the separation of the titles. He pointed out that the divergence of name was probably to be explained by the history of the fragments, and that their style is consistent with a single source.

² For reconstructions of Euripides' play from the existing material see Wilamowitz, Berl. Klassikertexte v 2 p. 69 f., and Starkie on Ar. Ach. p. 248 ff.

According to one account (Hygin. fab. 101), Telephus, in concert with Clytaemnestra, seized the child Orestes from his cradle before taking refuge at the altar, and threatened to kill him unless his prayer was granted. When the Berlin papyrus was first deciphered, Wilamowitz inferred from the reading 'Ορέστα in col. i 2 that the incident formed part of Sophocles' design, but, now that Schubart has restored παρέστα, the inference falls to the ground. It had already been argued by L. Pollak (Zwei Vasen aus der Werkstatt Hierons, Leipzig, 1900) from a vase-painting, which he refers to a date earlier than 470 B.C., that the Orestes-episode did not belong to the original version of the story given in the Cypria. On the vase Telephus has taken refuge at the altar: his right hand covers his wounded foot, and his left hand is stretched out in the direction of a warrior (Achilles) who has drawn his sword against him, while he looks for protection to a seer (Calchas) who is approaching on the right. Pollak's conclusion is entirely consistent with the statement of the schol. Ar. Ach. 332, attributing the Orestes-episode to Aeschylus. Nauck (TGF p. 76) regards the insertion of Aeschylus' name as a mere blunder, but, whereas most writers have agreed in supposing that the seizure of the child was introduced—if not for the first time—by Euripides, Wecklein (Die dramatische Behandlung des Telephosmythus, München, 1909, p. 16) has gone so far as to deny that it was mentioned by him at all, except possibly by way of criticizing Aeschylus. However this may be, there is no evidence connecting it with Sophocles, and it is more agreeable to his usual procedure to suppose that he adhered as closely as possible to the narrative of the κύκλος (Athen. 277 D). It is a fair inference that the action of the play took place at Argos, and the new fragment indicates that the reconciliation with the Greeks had already been achieved. The words σὲ γὰρ Τεγεᾶτις...ἀλίων ἐρετμῶν (col. ii 7—10) may be taken to show that the Greek origin of Telephus had been established, and that the Greeks had accepted him as their destined pilot to the Trojan coast in accordance with an oracle imparted to them by Calchas. We may compare Hyginus (l.c.): Archivis autem quod responsum erat, sine Telephi ductu Troiam capi non posse, facile cum eo in gratiam redierunt et ab Achille petierunt, ut eum sanaret. It remained only to satisfy the requirements of the oracle given to Telephus (ὁ πρῶστας ἰάσεται), and for this purpose the words addressed by Odysseus to Achilles are significant—ἐν δέοντι δ' ἦλθες, ὦ παῖ Πηλέως. Odysseus was chosen for his discretion to negotiate with Achilles, who had not arrived at the beginning of the play (cf. fr. 144). We cannot tell how he gained his point, but it seems unlikely that the discovery of Telephus' origin was the chief factor in persuading Achilles to give his assistance. The course of the subsequent dénouement is perhaps to be traced, as Wecklein (p. 20) suggests, in Hyginus: quibus Achilles respondit se artem medicam non nosse. tunc Ulixes ait: non te dixit Apollo, sed auctorem vulneris hastam nominat. quam cum rasissent, remediatus est.

The title was well known in antiquity, as appears from schol. BT on Hom. Θ 519 λέξασθαι... ὅθεν καὶ λογάδες καὶ σὺλλογος Ἀχαιῶν. Wilamowitz argues that the date of composition must have been earlier than the production of Euripides' more complex play.

142

col. i

.	π]αρέστα	2
desunt duo versus
.] . ει	5
.]	ι
.
.]ν μὲν φυγάδες	10
.
	ισκουν desunt cetera

col. ii

ἡ νότ[ου ἡ] ζεφύρ[ο]ιο δίνα πέμ[ψει T]ρωάδας ἀκτάς.

142. ii 1 δίνα Murray: δεινα pap.

142 Berliner Klassikertexte v 2 p. 64. The above fragments are taken from the upper part of a roll 14 cm. high and 19 cm. broad. The writing tends to assume a cursive form, and is stated to belong to the second century A.D. The first column was entirely occupied with the chorus which is concluded in col. ii.

Col. i 2 παρέστα was restored by Schubart. Wilamowitz at first read Ὀπέστα, deducing therefrom an important argument concerning the development of the plot which he subsequently abandoned. See Introductory Note.

Col. ii 1. On the assumption that some such word as αὔρα must have gone before, Wilamowitz suggested νῦν γὰρ στόλον ἀμὼν ἔελλα. He points out that the genitive in -οιο was not previously certified for Sophocles, although Φρυγίοιο had been conjectured in Alc. 210. But it is probable that Murray's correction δίνα should be adopted: the same error was detected by Hermann in Aesch. Pers. 579. The objection that δίνα should mean an eddying wind is not maintainable; for swift rather than circular motion might have been expressed by it. Cf. Eur. Alc. 245 οὐράνιοι τε δίναι νεφέλας δρομαίων.

σύ τε π[ηδ]αλίωι παρεδρεῖ[ων] φράσε[ις τῷ] κατὰ πρῶ <ι> ρα[ν] εὐθὺς Ἰ[λίου]ν πόρον Ἀτρεῖδ[αν] ἰδέσθαι.
 σὲ γὰρ Τε[γ]εάτις ἡμῖν, Ἑλλάς, οὐ[χ] ἰ Μυσία, τίκει ναύταν σὺν τινι δὴ θεῶν καὶ πεμπτήρ' ἄλιων ἐρετμῶν.

5

10

ΑΧΙΛΛΕῦ μῶν καὶ σὺ καινὸς ποντίας ἀπὸ χθονὸς ἦκεις, Ὀδυσσεύ; ποῦ ἔστι σύλλογος φίλων;
 τί μέλλετ'; οὐ χρὴν ἥσυχον κείσθαι π[ό]δα.

ΟΔ Δοκεῖ στρατεύειν καὶ μέλει τοῖς ἐν τέλει
 τὰδ' ἐν δέοντι δ' ἦλθες, ὦ παῖ Πηλέως. 15

6 Ἀτρεῖδαν scripsi: Ἀτρεῖδα Wilamowitz

3 ff. If the restoration of Wilamowitz is adopted, it is remarkable that, in a passage where the functions of πρωτεύς and κυβερνήτης are so sharply distinguished, Agamemnon should be identified with the former and described as subject to the orders of Telephus. Cf. Plut. Agis 1 οἱ πρωτεῖς τὰ ἐμπροσθεν προορώμενοι τῶν κυβερνητῶν ἀφορώς πρὸς ἐκείνους καὶ τὸ προστασσόμενον ὑπ' ἐκείνων ποιοῦσιν. The look-out man was specially charged to watch for a change in the wind: Ar. Eg. 543 πρωτεύσαι καὶ τοὺς ἀνέμους διαθρήσαι. Was it likely that Agamemnon would undertake such a task? Nor do I think that the text is justified by the metaphorical use of πρωτάτης in fr. 524, 1, where see n. I hesitate therefore to accept Ἀτρεῖδα in v. 6, and should prefer to substitute Ἀτρεῖδαν. It is worth notice that, although Ἀτρεῖδαι etc. occur in Sophocles more than 30 times, the singular is only found in At. 1349. For the metre, bacchiac dipody in place of Keizianum, see e.g. Eur. Tro. 321. I am also unable to agree with Wilamowitz in joining εὐθὺς Ἰλίου, which he compares with the isolated Eur. Hipp. 1157. It is simpler to give εὐθὺς its usual meaning, and to treat Ἰλίου as an objective genitive: cf. Eur. Cycl. 108 πορθμὸν οὐκ ᾔδεισθα πατρώας χθονός; I. T. 1066 γῆς πατρώας νόστος. Hom. ε 344 νόστον | γαίης Φαιάκων. So perhaps Ἰλίου στόλον Eur. I. A. 816 (England). There is no difficulty in the combination of such an objective genitive with the possessive: see O. C. 729, Eur. Phoen. 934 (n.). For ιδέσθαι = to look out for, cf. At. 1165 σπεύσαν κοίλῃν κάπετόν τιν' ἰδεῖν. Phil. 467 πλοῦν μὴ ἔξ ἀπόπτον μάλλον ἢ ἡγύθεν σκοπεῖν. Eur. Hec. 901 μένειν ἀνάγκη πλοῦν ὁρῶντας ἡσυχον. Plat. legg. 866 D σκηνησάμενος ἐν θαλάττῃ τέγγων τοὺς πόδας πλοῦν ἐπιφυλαττέτω.

7 Τεγεάτις. Sophocles also employed the form Τεγεάς (fr. 1100).

9 σὺν τινι δὴ θεῶν: cf. Aesch. Pers. 167 ὄλβον, ὃν Δαρείος ἤρεν οὐκ ἄνευ θεῶν τινός. Eur. Phoen. 1614 (ὥστε) ἄνευ θεῶν τον ταῦτ' ἐμνηχανσάμεν.

10 πεμπτήρ is a new word.

11 ποντίας...χθονός, his island home of Ithaca. Wilamowitz points out that this use of πόντιος does not occur in Aesch. or Eur. and quotes Phil. 269 ποντίας Χρύσης. Pind. Nem. 8. 18 ποντία Κύπρου.

12 σύλλογος φίλων helps to identify the play. Cf. Eur. I. A. 1545 Ἀχαιῶν σύλλογος στρατεύματος.

13 ἥσυχον...πόδα occurs also in Eur. Bacch. 647 στήσον πόδ', ὀργῇ δ' ὑπόδες ἥσυχον πόδα, where however it has been much suspected, and in Med. 217 οἱ δ' ἀφ' ἡσυχον πόδος | δόσανον ἐκτέησαντο καὶ ῥαθυμῶν.

14 τοῖς ἐν τέλει is another slight indication of Sophocles' authorship, since this phrase occurs four times in the extant plays, but nowhere in Euripides.

ΑΧΙΑΛ οὐ μὴν ἐπ' ἀκταῖς γ' ἐστὶ κωπήρης στρατός, οὐτ' οὖν ὀπλίτης ἐξετάζεται παρών.

ΟΔ ἀλλ' αὐτίκα· σπεύδειν γὰρ ἐν καιρῷ χρεών.

ΑΧΙΑΔΕ αἰεὶ ποτ' ἐστὲ νωχελεῖς καὶ μέλλετε, ρήσεις θ' ἕκαστος μυρίας καθήμενος 20
λέγει, τὸ δ' ἔργον [οὐ]δαμοῦ πορεύεται.
κ[α]γ[ω] μὲν, ὡς ὀρᾷ[τ]ε, δρᾶν ἔτοιμος ὦν
ἤ[κ]ω, στρατός τε M[υρ]μιδῶν, καὶ πλεύσ[ομαι] [λιπ]ῶν Ἀτρείδα[ιν καὶ στρατοῦ] με[λ]λήμ[ατα].

22 οραι[.] Je pap.

16 οὐ μὴν...γ' is adversative, (yet... not). γε never follows μὴν immediately and sometimes the intervening word or words alone are emphasized: cf. O. T. 810 οὐ μὴν ἴσῃν γ' ἔπεισεν. See also on Eur. Phoen. 1622.—Wecklein objects to κωπήρης στρατός, requiring στόλος as in Aesch. Pers. 417, and would read ἑκκεκῶ-πενται στρατός from fr. 145. The objection is hypercritical, and the proposed alteration would make ὀπλίτης in v. 17 unintelligible.

17 οὐτ' οὖν. Since the time of Elmsley scholars have generally agreed in condemning οὐ...οὐτε in parallel clauses, where it is given by the MSS of Attic writers (Kuehner-Gerth II 28, Jebb on Trach. 1058). Homer has received less stringent treatment: see Leaf on X 265. Wilamowitz argues that οὐτ' should be kept here, on the ground that where the first negative is strengthened, as here or by τις, τοι or τι, τε may stand in the second clause. The suggested rule is questionable, but, when he says that οὐδ' would be impossible with ὅν following, he undoubtedly goes too far: cf. O. C. 1134 οὐκ ἔγωγε σε, οὐδ' ὅν ἐάσω. In view of the many instances where οὐδέ has been corrupted to οὐτε, I should prefer (with Wecklein) to read οὐδ' here.—ὀπλίτης: sc. στρατός.

18 ἀλλά, introducing an objection: Kuehner-Gerth II 288. Cf. Eur. Phoen. 1618 (n.). Odysseus replies with a familiar tag, not far removed from our 'more haste, worse speed.' Cf. Phil. 637 ἥ ται καίριος σπουδὴ πόνου | λήξαντος ὅπνου κἀνάπαιλαν ἤγαγεν. So in Eur. Hel. 718 σπεύδων δ' ὅτ' ἐσπεύδ' οὐδὲν εἶχε is equivalent to σπεύδων ἀκαίρως.

19 νωχελεῖς: also in Eur. Or. 800 πλευρὰ νωχελὴ νόσφ. Wilamowitz calls it an Ionism.

20 ῥήσεις, here of deliberative speeches; but the word never developed this as a technical sense. Cf. Aesch. Suppl. 623 τοῖνδ' ἐπειθεν ῥῆσιν ἀμφ' ἡμῶν λέγων. Achilles is the typical man of action, who finds debate trivial, and ῥήσεις λέγειν has the same slightly contemptuous force as the common λόγους λέγειν (Wilamowitz).—καθήμενος, inactive: so Dem. 2. 23 ἀλλ' οἶμαι καθήμεν' οὐδὲν ποιοῦντες. id. 24 τὰ δ' ὑμέτερ' αὐτῶν ἀπολωλεκότες κάθησθε. 4. 9 μέλλοντας ἡμᾶς καὶ καθήμενους περιστοιχίζεται.

21 οὐδαμοῦ πορεύεται, 'in no degree (quarter) is forwarded.' The local sense of οὐδαμοῦ is transferred to the moral sphere (fr. 106 n.), but it has not become equivalent to οὐδαμῶς. So in Eur. Her. 841 ἡ θεοὶ μὲν οὐδαμοῦ and elsewhere, but in O. T. 908 the ordinary meaning is possible. The passive sense of πορεύεσθαι appears in Al. 1254. Cf. fr. 314, 324.

22 ὀρᾶς με was printed in the editio princeps, but Schubart has since reported that the space is insufficient for that reading. It seems to follow that the insertion of ι was an error, and that ὀρᾶτε should be adopted, as proposed by Hunt.

23 is echoed in Eur. I. A. 818 τὰ τῶν Ἀτρείδων μὴ μένων μελλήματα. This is not so much imitation as involuntary reminiscence, and there are several similar instances, such as e.g. Eur. Med. 523 ἀλλ' ὥστε ναὸς κενὸν οἰακαστρόφον after Aesch. Theb. 61 σὺ δ' ὥστε ναὸς κενὸς οἰακαστρόφος. For other examples see Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 1356.

The metres of the choral ode present hardly any difficulty:—	---	---	ba. ba.
-----	-----	-----	enhopl. Archil.
----- Alcaic. quatern. (enhopl.)	-----	-----	cr. ia. sp. (cf. Ai. 197, 400)
----- pherecr.	-----	-----	glycon.
----- paroem. (enhopl.)	-----	-----	Alcaic. quatern. (enhopl.)
----- pherecr.	-----	-----
----- lecyth.	-----	-----

col. iii

restant tantum personarum nominum hic illic vestigia, ita tamen ut στιχομυθίαν a versu undecimo usque ad vicesimum et fortasse latius pertinuisse ostendant

143 ὡς ναοφύλακες νυκτέρου ναυκληρίας πλήκτροις ἀπευθύνουσιν οὐρίαν τρόπιν.

143 Pollux 10. 143 ναυτικά δὲ σκεύη κάλοι... πηδάλια πλήκτρα, ὡς Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἀχαιῶν συλλόγῳ 'ὡς... τρόπιν.'

It is a mistake to suppose that the Greeks did not sail by night, seeing that the use of the stars for the purpose of navigation was attributed to Palamedes (fr. 432). But if the sky was clouded it was necessary to lay to, and the sailor's dread of night became proverbial. Aesch. fr. 193 (Cicero's tr.) navem ut horrissono freto | noctem paventes timidi adnec-tunt navitae. Suppl. 777 φιλεῖ | ὠδῶνα τικτεν νύξ κυβερνήτῃ σοφῷ. Theogn. 1375 ὁλβιοι δασις... οὐκ οἶδε θάλασσαν | οὐδὲ ὁ ἐν πόντῳ νύξ ἐπιούσα μέλει. Here the point of the comparison is lost, but we may guess that stress was laid upon the risk run by every sailor at night, even when wind (οὐρίαν) and weather were in his favour. Or it may be that the skill of the nocturnal pilot, and not the danger of his enterprise, was the chief motive of the simile. See Zenob. 5. 32 οὐ νυκτι-πλοεῖς: ἐπὶ τῶν μὴ ἀκριβῶς τι ποιούντων.

ἡ γὰρ νύξ ἀκριβεστέρα τῆς ἡμέρας τοῖς πελαγοδρομοῦσι, διὰ τὰς τῶν ἀστρῶν σημειώσεις. ὁ δὲ Χρῆσιππος ἀφελὼν τὴν 'οὐ' ἀπόφασιν 'νυκτιπλοεῖς' εἶπεν (Sikis. vet. fr. 111 p. 302). Strabo 757: the Sidonians became skilled astronomers largely in consequence of their enterprise in nocturnal navigation.

1 ναυκληρίας. Campbell is probably right in concluding that the word is used here for a ship; see n. on Eur. Hel. 1519 τίς δὲ νῦν ναυκληρία | ἐκ τῆσδ' ἀπῆρε χθονός; But we must not lose sight of the possible alternative: 'pilots of a voyage by night.' There is in any case a pleonasm in the combination of ναοφύλακες and ναυκληρίας; see n. on Eur. Phoen. 1549 πόδα τυφλόπων.

2 πλήκτροις is a synonym for the ordinary πηδάλιος. They quote Hdt. 1. 194 ἰθύνεται δὲ ὑπὸ τε δύο πλήκτρων, καὶ δύο ἀνδρῶν ὀρθῶν ἐστρώτων' καὶ ὁ μὲν ἔσω ἔλκει τὸ πλήκτρον, ὁ δὲ ἔξω ὠθέει. Cf. Sil. Ital. 14. 401 residentis ruderis magistri | affixit plectro dextram.

144

σὺ δ' ἐν θρόνοισι γραμμάτων πτυχὰς ἔχων
νέμ' εἴ τις οὐ πάρεστιν ὃς ξυνώμοσεν.

144. 1 πτυχὰς Toup: πτύχας codd. 2 νέμ' εἴ τις Bergk: ἀπόμεμον νέμει τις codd. | πάρεστιν ὃς Bergk: πάρεστι τις codd.

144 Schol. Pind. Isth. 2. 68 τὸ γὰρ ἀπόμεμον ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀνάγνωθι. Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἀχαιῶν συλλόγῳ: 'σὺ δ' ἐν θρόνοισι γραμμάτων πτύχας ἔχων ἀπόμεμον νέμει τις οὐ πάρεστι τις ξυνώμοσεν.' καὶ Παρθένιος ἐν τῇ Ἀρήτῃ τὸ ἀνεμει (ἀνεμει Valckenaer) ἀντί τοῦ ἀνάγνωθι· καὶ ἀνέμῃ δαριστὶ <ὁ> βουκόλος [referring to Theocr.

 18. 47 f. γράμματα δ' ἐν φλοιῷ γεγρά-ψεται, ὡς παριῶν τις | ἀννείμῃ Δωριστὶ
 'σέβον μ'. 'Ἐλένας φυτὸν εἰμ'].

The fragment relates to a muster of the Achaean chiefs held immediately before their departure for Troy. The number present is to be ascertained by reference to a list of the suitors of Helen, who had joined in taking an oath to Tyndareus:
 δτου γυνὴ γένοιτο Τυνδαρίς κόρη, | τούτω
 συναμνεῖν, εἰ τις ἐκ δόμων λαβίων | οἰχοῖτο
 (Eur. I.A. 61). Cf. Ai. 1113, Phil. 72, Thuc. 1. 9, Hes. fr. 96, 40 ff. Rz. H. suggests that probably Achilles was found to be absent.

1 ἐν θρόνῳσι. Welcker thought that the words were spoken by Odysseus to Agamemnon. However this may be, the person addressed appears to be seated on a high chair for the purpose of taking the roll: Agamemnon was princeps inter pares, and is never treated as monarch of the Achaeans, so that a reference to his royalty would be out of place. For the Homeric θρόνος see Ameis-Henze on α 132. Herwerden, thinking of a document kept in a place of security, proposed ἐν δόμοισι.—πνυχάς: here metre requires the accentuation which is now generally adopted. See Sandys on Eur.
Bacch. 62. Cf. Eur. fr. 506, 2 ἐν δέλτῳ
 πνυχάς | γράφειν τιν' αὐτά.

2 νέμ· εἰ τις. The text of Pindar's scholium is unfortunately corrupt, and the value of his testimony has been variously estimated. There is no doubt that some of the uses of νέμω and its compounds never passed into current Attic, and afterwards became obsolete. The scholiast argues that ἀπόνειμον in Pindar means
 'read,' apparently on the ground that νέμω (cf. Hesych. III p. 147 νέμει· ἀναγινώσκει νέμει· ἀναγινώσκει· νέμω· ἀναγινώσκει) and ἀνανέμω (cf. Epicharm. fr. 224 K.) are used in the same sense by other poets.

In Theocritus l.c. the meaning—'to read' to oneself (strictly, perhaps, 'to con over' or 'spell out')—is certain, and we may believe that Parthenius (first century B.C.), a learned poet, is following some such authority. In Pindar most editors have refused to follow the scholiast, but Bury is inclined to adopt ἀνανέμω with Tyrrell, who suggests for our line ἀνανέμω· εἰ τις οὐ πάρ' ὅς ξυνώμωσεν. But they have omitted to point out that the Greek for recitare or recensere is ἀνανέμωσθαι: Hdt.
 1. 173 ἐρομένου δέ... τίς ἐστι, καταλέξει ἐωυτὸν μητρόθεν καὶ τῆς μητρὸς ἀνανέμεται τὰς μητέρας. The schol. on Ar. Av. 1289 held that ἀπενέμωτο glanced at the meaning ἀνεγίνωσκον. To this should correspond νέμωσθαι citare, answering to νέμειν 'to mark off, put down, register,' which we find in the phrase νέμειν προστάτην: cf. Polyb. 6. 47. 8 τῶν ἀθλητῶν τοὺς μὴ νενεμημένους, 'unlicensed athletes.'
 So κατανέμω in Aeschin. 1. 155 ἵνα ὕβρις κατανέμῃτε εἰς τὴν προσήκουσαν τάξιν Τίμαρχον, ib. 159. It is possible therefore that we should read νέμῃ, and make the sentence interrogative ('won't you call over...?'). But, on the whole, Bergk's νέμ· εἰ τις accounts better for the facts, and particularly for the interpolation of ἀπό-νειμον (see cr. n.). We should render accordingly: 'mark off on your list any who are not present.' Madvig, who restored νέμειν, interpreted it similarly ('dinumerabis'). J., however, says of νέμειν, 'it is simply "give us," i.e., "let us hear."' So also Ellis, criticizing Campbell's rendering 'observe.'—οὐ πάρεστιν.
 These words are suggestive of a muster-roll: see Tucker on Aesch. Cho. 695 παροῦσαν ἐγγράφῃ and Headlam in C.R.
 xvii 246.—ὅς (see cr. n.) seems to be a necessary correction, unless the corruption lies deeper. Tucker (C.R. xvii 190) proposed ἀπόνειμ·, τίς πάρεστι; τίς ξυνώμωσεν; But that surely would be too abrupt.

145

ἐκκεκώπεται

145 Hesych. II p. 44 ἐκκεκώπεται
 (Musurus for ἐκκεκώπηται)· ἐξήρτηται (ἐξήρτηται cod.). Σοφοκλῆς Συλλόγῳ ('Ἀχαιῶν συλλόγῳ Musurus). Meineke restored ἐκκεκώπεται, referring to Hesych. II p. 460 κεκώπεται στρατός, ὁ ἐπὶ κώπῃς and proposed ἐξήρτηται <κώπαις> to complete the gloss. Nauck thought that the simple verb κεκώπεται ought to be substituted, but the fondness of Sophocles for verbs compounded with ἐκ and with slightly intensive force makes the suggestion unnecessary: see on fr. 524. Meineke thought that κεκώπεται στρατός was taken from a tragic poet, and so Wecklein. The question remains whether ἐκκεκώπεται meant 'is provided with oars,' or 'is equipped with weapons.' In favour of the latter, see on Eur. Hel. 1128 μονόκωπος ἀνὴρ and

cf. Timoth. Pers. 155 σιδαρόκωπος Ἑλλάν. But of course the other meaning, which Hesych. recognizes (II p. 460 κεκώπεται ἡ ναὺς), is perfectly legitimate, if required by the context. See also Boeckh, Urkunden, p. 291, who gives from an inscription τῶν ζυγῶν κεκώπεται Π.

146

ἐπιξενούσθαι

146 Hesych. II p. 162 ἐπιξενούσθαι· μαρτυρέσθαι, πορεύεσθαι. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀχαιῶν συλλόγῳ καὶ Δισχόλῳ Κρήσσαις (II. 120).

The inference to be drawn is that in one of the passages cited ἐπιξενούσθαι was equivalent to μαρτυρέσθαι, and in the other to πορεύεσθαι. For the first (= to demand good offices), which arises from the host becoming bail (so to speak) for his guest to his fellow-countrymen, cf. Aesch. Ag. 1319 ἐπιξενούμαι ταῦτα δ' ὡς θανουμένην. ξενόδοκος and ξενόδοκεῖν are said to have been used for μάρτυς and μαρτυρεῖν by Simonides or Pindar: see Apollon. lex. Hom. s.v. and Etym. M. p. 610, 42. The other meaning is apparently to be on one's travels, or to sojourn abroad. It occurs in Isocr. ep. 6 τὸ μὴ πρέπειν ἐπιξενούσθαι τοῖς τηλικούτοις, Arist. pol. 4 (7). 6. 1327^a 13, Etym. M. p. 470, 47, and is based upon the phrase ἐπὶ ξένῃς εἶναι, for which see O. C. 184, 563, Eur. Andr. 135.

147

ἐπισειούσης

147 Hesych. II p. 167 ἐπισειούσης· ἐπιχειουμένης. ἀπὸ τῶν τὰς ἡνίας ἐπιχαλῶντων (ἐπιχαλόντων cod.: corr. Musurus, χαλῶντων Naber). Σοφοκλῆς Ἀχαιῶν συλλόγῳ.

The action of a driver encouraging his team by slackening the reins and shaking them over the horses' backs is familiar to everyone: see El. 711 οἱ δ' ἅμα ἵπποις

ὁμοκλήσαντες ἡνίας χερσὶν | ἔσεισαν, Eur. I. A. 151 πάλιν εἰσόρμα, σείε χαλινούς. The transition from ἐπισείειν ἡνίας to ἐπισείειν τινά is illustrated by Eur. Or. 255 μὴ πῖσειέ μοι | τὰς αἱματιποῦς καὶ δρακοντώδεις κόρας, id. 613. The coincidence of the latter with ἐπισείζειν is accidental.

148

ξυμβόλους

148 Hesych. III p. 172 ξυμβόλους· τοὺς διὰ τῶν πταρυμῶν οἰωνισμοὺς ἔλεγον. ἀντιθέντο δὲ οὗτοι Δήμητρι. τινὲς δὲ τὰς διὰ τῆς φήμης γινόμενας μαντείας, ὥς Φιλόχορος φησὶ (EHG I 416) Δήμητρα εὐρεῖν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἀχαιῶν συλλόγῳ (σύλλογον cod.). The first part of the gloss recurs in Phot. lex. p. 311, 1, Suid. s.v. ξυμβόλους.

ξύμβολος, properly an adjective to

οἰωνός in the wider sense, was the name given to anything capable of significance as an omen which a man might encounter in moving from place to place. Aesch. Prom. 302 κληθόντας τε δυσκρίτους | ἐγνώρις αὐτοῖς ἐνοδίου τε συμβόλους. Ag. Av. 719 ὄρνιν τε νομίζετε πάνθ' ὅσα περ περὶ μαντείας διακρίνει· | φήμη γ' ἡμῖν ὄρνις ἐστί, πταρυμὸν τ' ὄρνιθα καλεῖτε, | ξύμβολον ὄρνιν, φωνὴν ὄρνιν, θεράποντ'

δρυν, ὄνον δρυν. There the schol. gives a definition: ξύμβολον δρυν φησίν, ἐπειδὴ συμβόλοι ἐποιοῦν τοὺς πρώτα ξυναντῶντας, καὶ ἐξ ἀπαντήσεώς τι προσημαίνοντας, and then proceeds in words identical with the first part of Hesychius' note. In Xen. mem. 1. 1. 3 it is implied that σύμβολοι are derived from οἱ ἀπαντῶντες. Several instances are given in Hor. Carmin. 3. 27. 1 ff. So, to stumble on leaving the house was ill-omened: Tibull. 1. 3. 19. The eagles and the hare are called ὀδίων τέρας as σύμβολοι in Aesch. Ag. 104. It will be observed that Hesych. and the schol. Ar. call παρμύς a case of σύμβολος, although Aristophanes keeps them apart, and that Hesych. seems to identify φήμη and σύμβολος, although all the ancient authorities distinguish them. The explanation is that the classes into which omens are divided are not mutually exclusive. A speech (φήμη) might be at once ominous in itself, and also σύμβολος if addressed to or heard by the person whose fortunes are affected.

ΑΧΙΛΛΕΩΣ ΕΡΑΣΤΑΙ

This was a satyr-play, as fr. 153 proves. It is probable that the satyrs were themselves represented as unsuccessful lovers of Achilles, and as filled with indignation in consequence. Wilamowitz thinks that Achilles was the pattern of the Athenian παῖς καλός, and that Phoenix (see fr. 153) was his παιδαγωγός¹. Another character appearing was Peleus (fr. 150), who may have warned Achilles that the sports of his boyhood must soon be exchanged for the life of a warrior (fr. 156). Welcker inferred that the scene of the play was laid in the home of Peleus at Phthia, but the cave of Chiron on Mt Pelion is a much more likely haunt of satyrs, and is clearly indicated by the language of fr. 154. It was moreover in the cave of Chiron that Heracles met Achilles and fell a victim to his beauty. The story was related by Antisthenes in his well-known work entitled Heracles (Eratosth. catasterism. 40 p. 264 West., Procl. in Plat. Alc. 1 p. 98 Cr.), and was doubtless taken by him from older sources: cf. Ov. Fast. 5. 381 ff. It may therefore be conjectured with some confidence that the arrival of Heracles was an episode in Sophocles. There is some authority for reckoning Chiron himself as a lover of Achilles (Dio Chrys. 58. 4 II p. 130 Arn.); but that tradition is less likely to be early. The case of Patroclus must be left doubtful. Aeschylus in the Myrmidons (TGF p. 44) represented Achilles as the ἐραστής, and is followed by many late authors (e.g. Philostr. epist. 8, Martial 11. 43. 10). But Plato in Symp. 180A rebukes Aeschylus as guilty of a perverse error on the ground that Homer makes Patroclus the elder (A 737), and does not hesitate to call Patroclus the ἐραστής: so also Aristarchus (p. 187 Lehrs). No inference should be drawn from Phil. 434.

¹ Observe that, according to Apollod. 3. 175, Phoenix was cured of his blindness by Chiron. Wagner suggests that this may have been the motive of the presence both of Peleus and of Phoenix.

It is generally admitted that the play of Sophocles is referred to by Ov. Trist. 2. 409 est et in obscenos commixta tragoedia risus, | multaue praeteriti verba pudoris habet. | nec nocet auctori, mollem qui fecit Achillem, | infregisse suis fortia facta modis.

149

τὸ γὰρ νόσημα τοῦτ' ἐφίμερον κακόν·
ἔχοιμ' ἂν αὐτὸ μὴ κακῶς ἀπεικάσαι.
ὅταν πάγου φανέντος αἰθρίου χεροῖν κρύσταλλον ἀρπάσωσι παῖδες εὐπαγῇ, τὰ πρῶτ' ἔχουσιν ἡδονὰς ποταινίους· 5
τέλος δ' ὁ χυμὸς οὐθ' ὅπως ἀφῇ θέλει, οὐτ' ἐν χεροῖν τὸ πῆγμα σύμφορον μένειν.

149. 1 τὸ γὰρ νόσημα Dobree: ἔρωτος γὰρ νόσημα SMA, νόσημ' ἔρωτος cod. Paris. 1985 | ἐφίμερον Arsenius: ἐφήμερον codd. [quod tamen Hense silentio negare videtur] 3 χεροῖν cod. Paris. 1985: χερσίν SMA 4 παῖδες εὐπαγῇ Campbell: παιδιαῖσαγῇ S, παιδιαῖς ἀγῇ (ἀγῇ A) MA, παῖδες ἀσταγῇ Salmasius, παιδιαῖς χάριν Blaydes, παῖδες εὐαγῇ Elter 5 ποταινίους cod. Paris. 1985: ποτ' ἐνίους SMA 6 sq. corrupta: v. infra | ὅτως M 7 πῆγμα Gompertz: κτήμα S, κτήμ' ἀσύμφορον MA | fort. μένει

149 Stob. flor. 64. 13 (iv p. 460, 7 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἀχιλλεῶς ἑρασταῖς. 'ἔρωτος γὰρ... προῖεται.' There is an allusion to the passage in Zenob. 5. 58 (Paroemi. 1 p. 144): ὁ παῖς τὸν κρύσταλλον ἐπὶ τῶν μῆτε κατέχειν δυναμένων μῆτε μεθεῖναι βουλομένων ἢ παροιμία εἴρηται. μέμνηται αὐτῆς Σοφοκλῆς Ἀχιλλεῶς ἑρασταῖς. Cf. Plut. de garrul. 12 p. 508 D ὥσπερ οἱ παῖδες τὸν κρύσταλλον οὕτε κατέχειν οὐτ' ἀφίεναι θέλουσι.

1 The reading of the MSS (see cr. n.) appears to be due to the intrusion of a gloss. The cod. Paris. (Gaisford's B) is as usual interpolated.—Nauck retains ἐφίμερον, which is flat: he formerly proposed ἀνήμερον from Mosch. 1. 10. J. thought ἐφίμερον clearly right—'an attractive evil, but an evil still.' There is probably an allusion to Sappho's description of Love as γλυκύπικρον ἀμάχανον ὄρεσσαν (fr. 40): cf. Anth. Pal. 5. 133, Plut. qu. conv. 5. 7. 2 p. 681 B ἡδονῆς ἀληθοῦς μεμιγμένης, ἣν αὐτοὶ γλυκύπικρον νομαρζουσιν, Theogn. 1353 πικρὸς καὶ γλυκὺς ἐστὶ καὶ ἀρπαλέος καὶ ἀπηνῆς (ἔρως).

2 The asyndeton is unusual and has provoked suspicion. Blaydes conjectured ἔχοιμ' ἂν αὐτὸ δ' οὐ κακῶς (or ἔχοιμ' δ' αὐτ' ἂν μὴ κακῶς). This is better than Nauck's ἔχουν δ' ἂν, adopted by Meineke. In the next line the asyndeton of the explanation (Kuehner-Gerth II 344) is natural.—μὴ κακῶς go together, like μὴ κακῇ in Trach. 722.

3 αἰθρίων: see on fr. 117. Blaydes would import χυθέντος from Phil. 293.

4 ἀσταγῇ, i.e., 'not trickling,' hard-frozen. 'The only objection to this reading arises from the ordinary use of ἀστακτος, etc., as "not merely trickling,"—"gushing" or "streaming." Eur. I. T. 1242 ἀστακτων μάτηρ ὕδατων. O. C. 1646 ἀντακτί (Plat. Phaed. 117 C). Ap. Rh. 3. 804 τὰ δ' (tears) ἔρρειν, ἀσταγὲς αὐτως.' (J.) With Hense I accept Campbell's εὐπαγῇ, which was independently proposed by Nauck.

5 τὰ πρῶτα adv., as in fr. 966.—ποταινίους, novas, as in Ant. 849, Aesch. Prom. 102.

6 f. It is generally recognized that these lines are corrupt, although no satisfactory remedy has been produced. J. was inclined to accept Meineke's κρυμὸς for χυμὸς, comparing fr. 507 and Eur. fr. 682, 3, but in other respects to defend the text. He construed οὐθ'...θέλει as 'will not consent to one's letting it go,' with an ellipse of τὸς as in El. 697 (n.). But, even if παῖς were the subject, ὅπως ἀφῇ in place of ἀφίεναι after θέλει would be quite impossible Greek: there is no analogy to the examples collected in οὕτω δὲ τοὺς ἐρώντας αὐτὸς ἡμερος δρᾶν καὶ τὸ μὴ δρᾶν πολλάκις προσίεται.

8 οὕτω δὲ (οὕτω γὰρ Gesner) Meineke: οὕτω SMA
codd.

9 προσίεται Meineke: προίεται

Goodw. § 572, or more fully by Hale in Trans. Am. Phil. Ass. xxiv 158. For this reason Meineke suggested οὐτ' ἀφίεσθαι θέλει and Kock τέλος δὲ κρυμὸς οὐθ' ὁ παῖς ἀφίεται οὐτ'...συνφέρειν θέλει. Similar suggestions are Apelt's οὐτ' ἀπεστράφηται θέλει, Hense's οὐτ' ἀποσβῆναι θέλει, and Gomperz's οὐτ' ἀποσπᾶσθαι θέλει. Blaydes argued that Zenobius' μεθεῖναι βουλομένων pointed to οὐθ' ὅπως μεθῆς ἐγ' οὐθ' ἐγ' μεθιέναι. Herwerden thought that some words must have fallen out: ὁ κρυμὸς <οὐκ ἀνασχετὸς πέλει | ὅμως δ' ὁ παῖς> κτέ. H. (in C. R. xvii 293) preferred that the first line should run τέλος δ' ἔχει νῦν οὐθ' ὁ παῖς ὅπως ἀφῆ, or τέλος δ' ὅπως ἀφῆ νῦν οὐθ' ὁ παῖς ἔχει, holding rightly that ἔχει is demanded by the construction. He points out that the indirect deliberative and the infinitive after ἔχει are combined by Sophocles in Ai. 428, Ant. 271. There are two objections to this view (1) that the change to the singular (ὁ παῖς) is awkward, and (2) that ἔχει does not fit the following line. With Dobree's θυμὸς (for χυμὸς) in the sense of 'desire,' we might continue οὐθ' ὅπως ἀφῆ σφ' ἔχει, treating v. 7 as a separate clause (scil. ἐστί). But it has also occurred to me that the corruption may have been from an original τέλος δ' ὁ χυμὸς οὐκ ὅπως ἀφίεται, οὐδ' κτέ. It is true that in prose, where the idiom chiefly occurs, ἀλλ' οὐδ' invariably introduces the second clause; but El. 796 shows that Sophocles did not shrink from using οὐκ ὅπως, and there is not sufficient evidence of early usage to prove that ἀλλ' οὐκ) (οὐδὲ was indispensable in the apodosis. With σύμφορον sc. ἐστί: but I cannot help suspecting that σύμφορος here meant packed together (cf. Xen. Cyrog. 8, 1 οὐδ' ἐὰν πνεῦμα ἢ μέγα· σύμφορον γὰρ τὴν χιόνα ἀφανίζει [i.e. τὰ ἰχθυή]), Pisides ap. Suid. s.v. συμφορά: ἐκ τῆς ἀμέτρου συμφορᾶς τῶν συμμάχων—περὶ χιόνος); and in that case μένει would be required. The conjecture πῆγμα (for κῆγμα), proposed by Gomperz and adopted by Nauck, is particularly attractive in this connexion. Blaydes, on the other hand, recommended πράγμ' ἀσύμφορον κρατεῖν.

9 δρᾶν...προσίεται. 'And thus desire often pleads with lovers at once to go on loving and to abandon their love.' So J., who remarks that δρᾶν=ἐρᾶν, as ἐρώντας indicates (Martin conj. ἐρᾶν τε καὶ μὴ: so Kock with τοὺς ἡρώντας ἄλλος ἡμέρου preceding). For the use of δρᾶν in place of a repetition of the leading verb see on Eur. Phoen. 516. προσίεται, when used in the sense of 'attracts' or 'wins over,' does not appear elsewhere to be accompanied by an infinitive, but follows the analogy of such verbs as πείθω and προτρέπω. For the use of the articular infinitive as complement (δρᾶν καὶ τι μὴ δρᾶν Meineke), where the simple infinitive would be expected, an idiom characteristic of Sophocles, cf. Trach. 545 τὸ δ' αὖ ξυνοικεῖν τῇδ' ὁμοῦ τίς ἀν' γυνὴ δύναιτο; Ant. 78 τὸ δὲ βίῃ πολιτῶν δρᾶν ἔφην ἀμήχανος, ib. 1106 μῶλις μὲν, καρδίας δ' ἐξίσταμαι | τὸ δρᾶν, Phil. 1252 ἀλλ' οὐδέ τοι σὴ χειρὶ πείθομαι τὸ δρᾶν. For the co-ordination of the simple infinitive with the articular in the same clause cf. El. 265 καὶ τῶνδ' ἐμοὶ | λαβεῖν θ' ὁμοίως καὶ τὸ τηρᾶσθαι πέλει, inf. fr. 188 n. For the adverbial use of αὐτὸς (=at once) cf. Phil. 119, 1330. H. conjectured τοῦ γ' ἐρώντος in v. 8 (J. P. xxiii 272), and, if that were accepted, the use of προσίεται would be parallel to Eur. fr. 893.

The following rendering is taken from J. (with slight modifications): 'This distemper is a joy mixed with pain. Here is no bad image of it;—when the frost hath come in bright weather, and children seize a solid lump of ice, at first they feel a new delight; but at last the melting mass cannot be dropped, and yet their treasure will not rest packed firmly in their hands. Even thus desire often urges lovers at once to persevere and to desist.' Love, J. adds, is the piece of ice, beautiful at first sight, which cleaves to the soul that has once admitted it; and at the same time causes such pain that the lover often wishes that he were freed from it.

150

τίς γάρ με μόχθος οὐκ ἐπεστάται; λέων δράκων τε, πῦρ, ὕδωρ.

1 ἐπεζάρει coni. Herwerden

2 ὕδωρ <τε> coni. Mekler

150 Schol. Pind. Nem. 3. 60 διωκομένη γὰρ ὑπ' αὐτοῦ (i.e. Thetis by Peileus) μετέβαλλε τὰς μορφὰς ὅτε μὲν εἰς πῦρ, ὅτε δὲ εἰς θηρία: ὁ δὲ καρτερήσας περιέγινε. περὶ δὲ τῆς μεταμορφώσεως αὐτῆς καὶ Σοφοκλῆς φησὶν ἐν Τρωίῳ (fr.
618) καὶ ἐν Ἀχιλλεύῳ ἐρασταῖς 'τίς
γάρ... ὕδωρ.'

1 f. τίς... οὐκ = πᾶς: see on fr. 959.
4. —ἐπεστάται. If the reading is correct, we are obliged to assume that ἐπιστάτειν is used in a sense otherwise unexampled (= to beset, visit), but corresponding to that of ἐπιστήναι (Trach. 1170 μόχθων τῶν ἐφειστώτων ἐμοί, O. T. 777 πρὶν μοι τύχη τοιάδ' ἐπέστη); and that it is followed by an accusative of the person attacked on the analogy of such cases as O. C.
942 οὐδέις ποτ' αὐτοῦς... ἄν ἐμπέσοι ζῆλος.
Otherwise the best correction is Herwerden's ἐπεζάρει (Eur. Phoen. 45 n.);

but, as the metre is not entirely satisfactory, Nauck, who formerly proposed ἐπεστρατεύετο, suggests τίς γάρ με <τίς με>... ἐπεζάρει;—λέων κτέ. For the metamorphoses of Thetis in her struggle to escape from Peleus see on fr. 618.
The particulars here given correspond to Pind. Nem. 4. 62 πῦρ δὲ παγκρατὲς
θρασυμαλχανῶν τε λεόντων | δυνῆας ὀξυ-
τάτους ἄκμων | καὶ δεινотάτων σχάσαι
ὀδόντων | ἔγαμεν κτέ., and to Apollod. 3.
170 γινόμενῃ δὲ ὅτε μὲν πῦρ ὅτε δὲ ὕδωρ ὅτε δὲ θηρίον. Jebb on Trach. 10 remarks that similar powers of transformation are ascribed to other sea-gods, such as Nereus and Proteus; and that they must be taken to symbolize the unstable character of the element.

151

[ἡ Θέτις ὑπὸ Πηλέως λειδορρηθεῖσα κατέλιπεν αὐτόν.]

151 Schol. Ap. Rh. 4. 816 Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Ἀχιλλεύῳ ἐρασταῖς φησὶν ὑπὸ Πηλέως λειδορρηθεῖσαν τὴν Θέτιν καταλιπεῖν αὐτόν.
The extract is repeated in schol. Ar. Nucl.
1068.

Dindorf should not have combined this notice with fr. 150. It is interesting to find the story of the quarrel between Peleus and Thetis vouched for by Sophocles; but he is not the oldest authority, as it is said to have been described in the epic Aegimius (fr. 2 K.; see Bethe in Pauly-Wissowa 1 963). The schol. on Apoll. Rhod. 11. 5., giving the epic version, says that Thetis used to test whether Peleus's children were immortal by plunging them into a cauldron of water; and that this proved fatal several times. When it was the turn of Achilles, Peleus stopped her. So Lycophr. 178, who makes Achilles the seventh child, ἀφ' ἐπὶ
παῖδων φειδάλῳ σποδομένῳ | μούνον φλέγουσιν ἐξαλόξαντα σποδόν. Here it will be observed that the child is burnt in the fire, not thrown into the water; and this is the usual version. Other authorities say nothing about the elder children:

Apollod. 3. 171 ὡς δὲ ἐγέννησε Θέτις ἐκ
Πηλέως βρέφος, ἀθάνατον θέλουσα ποιῆσαι τοῦτο, κρύφα Πηλέως εἰς τὸ πῦρ ἐγκρύβουσα τῆς νυκτὸς ἐφθεῖρεν ὃ ἦν αὐτῇ θυγτὴρ πατρῶν, μεθ' ἡμέραν δὲ ἔχρειν ἀμβροσίᾳ.
Πηλεὺς δὲ ἐπιτηρήσας καὶ σπαίροντα τὸν παῖδα ἰδὼν ἐπὶ τοῦ πυρὸς ἐβόησε· καὶ Θέτις κωλυθεῖσα τὴν προαίρεσιν τελειῶσαι, νῆπιον τὸν παῖδα ἀπολιποῦσα πρὸς Νηρηίδας ὤχετο.
In Apoll. Rhod. 4. 783 ff. Hera pleads with Thetis to afford good passage for the Argo: she had given Thetis the best of mortals for a husband, and held up the wedding-torch with her own hand; moreover, it is fated that in the Elysian plain Medea shall be wedded to Achilles, 'who is now being tended by Naiads in the home of Chiron, though he longeth for thy milk: help, then, thy future daughter, and Peleus himself; why is thy wrath
so firmly rooted?' Thetis accordingly

(851 ff.) appears to Peleus, and gives him certain directions, but warns him not to disclose her presence to his companions. νῦν δ' ἔχει, μή με χολώσῃς | πλεῖον ἔτ' ἢ τὸ πάροιθεν ἀπληγέως ἐχόλωσας (863 f.). Then she leaves him in great distress, for he had never seen her since she left his wedded couch in anger, when Achilles was still an infant. ἡ μὲν γὰρ βροτέας αἰεὶ περὶ σάρκας ἔβαιεν | νύκτα διὰ μέσσην φλογμῷ πυρός· ἥματα δ' αὐτὴ | ἀμβροσίῃ χρίσκεε τέρεν δέμας, ὅφρα πέλοιτο | ἀθάνατος, καὶ οἱ στυγερὸν χορὸν γῆρας ἀλάκοι. | αὐτὰρ ὅγ' ἐξ ἐνῆς ἀναπάλμενος εἰσενόησεν παῖδα φίλον σπαιρόντα διὰ φλογός· ἦκε δ' αὐτὴν | σμερδαλέην ἐσιδὼν, μέγα νήπιος· ἡ δ' αἰούσα | τὸν μὲν ἄρ' ἀπτάγῃ χαμάδις βάλε κεκληγῶτα, | αὐτὴ δὲ πνοιῇ κέλη

δέμας, ἥτ' ὄνειρος, | βῆ δ' ἔμειν ἐκ μεγάρου θοῶς, καὶ ἐσήλατο πόντον | χωσαμένη· μετὰ δ' οὐτι παλίσσυτος ἔκε· ὀπίσω. There are two or three touches here, which show that Apollonius and Apollodorus are following the same original. The schol. on Ar. Nub. 1068 seems to be conflating two different stories. It is obvious that the burning of Achilles in the fire is a doublet of the better-known legend of Demeter and Demophon, the brother of Triptolemus: see Hom. h. Dem. 231 ff., with Allen and Sikes's n. on 239. These stories have recently been explained as recording a rite of infant initiation, whereby the child's hold on life is supposed to be strengthened: see W. R. Halliday in C. R. xxv 8 ff.

152

ἢ δορὸς διχόστομον πλᾶκτρον·
δίπτυχοι γὰρ ὀδύναι μιν ἤρικον Ἀχιλλείου δόρατος.

152. 2 sq. νιν ἤρικον Ἀχιλλείου Bergk (ἤρικον iam L. Dindorf)

152 Schol. Pind. Nem. 6. 85 οὐκ ἐκ παραδρομῆς δὲ ῥάκτον εἶπε τὸ δόρυ τοῦ Ἀχιλλέως... ἀλλ' ὅτι ἰδιαίτερον παρὰ τὰ ἄλλα κατεσκευάστω. δίκρουν γὰρ ὥστε δύο αἰχμὰς ἔχειν καὶ μὴ βολῇ [ὥστε] δισπὰ τὰ τραύματα ἀπεργάζεσθαι. καὶ Αἰσχύλος ἐν Νηρείῳ (fr. 152) 'κάμακος εἰσι κάμακος γλῶσσημα διπλάσιον.' καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἀχιλλέως ἐρασταῖς 'ἡ... δόρατος.'

It is generally admitted that something is wrong with the tradition, and that the text exhibits a conflation of two fragments, the first of which ends at πλᾶκτρον. The difficulty was first observed by Heath, who claimed v. 1 as alone belonging to Sophocles. Dobree, however (according to Nauck: for I cannot trace the source of his statement), denied that any part of the quotation was Sophoclean. Bergk came to the same conclusion as Heath; but thought that vv. 2, 3 did not belong to another play of Sophocles such as the Μυσώ—for so the reference to Telephus might suggest—but derived from a lyric source. Accordingly he prints them as fr. 95 of his adespota (PLG III 720). Hermann on Eur. I. T. 210 was of the same opinion as Dobree.

The tradition relating to the double point of Achilles' spear does not seem to be recorded except in the passages quoted by the scholiast, viz. Aesch. fr. 152 and the Little Iliad (EGF p. 41) fr. 5.

1 πλᾶκτρον, any striking instrument, whether pointed as here, or not: cf. Eur. Alc. 128 διόβολον πλῆκτρον πυρός κε αὐνίου. (For the form of the thunderbolt see the representation given in C. R. xvii 276.) Ar. Av. 759 αἶρε πλῆκτρον, εἰ μαχεῖ, of the cock's spur.

2 δίπτυχοι does not occur elsewhere in Sophocles: see on Eur. Phoen. 1354.—μιν is banished from tragedy by most critics, at any rate from dialogue: see Trach. 388, Aesch. Eum. 634, Eur. Andr. 1136. Some still maintain it in lyrics: Tucker on Aesch. Cho. 620, Theb. 440. The fluctuation of the scribes is undoubted, and scholars are divided on the question whether νιν should be replaced everywhere in Pindar. The papyrus of the Paccans (see 6. 115) shows that the doubt existed at an early date. Bacchylides has μιν only at 10. 111.—ἤρικον is intransitive in Hom. P 295 ἤρικε δ' ἐκποδάσεια κόρυς περὶ δουρὸς ἄκωκη, and has consequently been altered to ἤρικον (see cr. n.), perhaps rightly. But δέηρικον is transitive in Euphronion 40 πλευρά τε καὶ θώρηκα δέηρικεν ἴλιον ἄχρισ, and in Alex. Aetol. ap. Parthen. 14 διὰ μὲν καλὸν ἤρικεν οὖσον.

153

παπαῖ, τὰ παιδίχ', ὡς ὀρᾷς, ἀπώλεσας.

153 ὀρᾷ ὁ anecd. Bachm., ὀρῶς anecd. Par. | ἀπώλεσαν anecd. Bachm.

153 Schol. Ar. Vesp. 1021 = Phot. lex. p. 369, 4 παιδικά· ἐπὶ θηλειῶν καὶ ἀρρένων ἐρωμένων τάττεται ἢ λέξις...καὶ ἐν τοῖς Ἀχιλλέως δ' ἐρασταῖς δῆλον ὡς οὕτως (scil. ἐπὶ τῶν ἀρρένων) ἐξεῖληπται. ἐπιδόντων γὰρ τι τῶν σατύρων εἰς τὴν γυναικίαν ἐπιθυμίαν φησὶν ὁ Φοῖνιξ 'παπαῖ...ἀπώλεσας.' See also Suid. s.v., Bachm. anecd. 1 p. 324, 16, Cramer anecd. Par. IV p. 173, 9.

When the satyrs inclined towards the love of women, Phoenix taunted them with treating their necessity as if it were a matter of choice.—παπαῖ here expresses scorn: more often it is used for simple astonishment, as in Plat. Legg. 704 C παπαῖ οἶον λέγεις = 'you don't say so!' Eur. Cycl. 572 παπαῖ, σοφὸν γε τὸ ξύλον τῆς ἀμπέλου.—Blaydes conjectured ὠνέρας for ὡς ὀρᾷς.

154

σὺ δ', ὦ Σύαγρε, Πηλιωτικὸν τρέφος

154 βρέφος Athenaei C, Eustath.

154 Athen. 401 D Σοφοκλῆς μὲν γὰρ ἐν Ἀχιλλέως ἐρασταῖς ἐπὶ κυνὸς ἔταξε τοῦνομα (scil. σύαγρος) ἀπὸ τοῦ σὺς ἀγρεύειν. λέγων 'σὺ δ'...τρέφος.' Eustath. Od. p. 1872, 12 Σοφοκλῆς 'σὺ δ'...βρέφος.' From Athen. also are drawn the statements in Gramm. Herm. p. 320 and anecd. Par. IV p. 245, 20 (A. Kopp, Beitr. zur gr. Excerpten-Litt. p. 159).

Πηλιωτικόν. In fr. 1069 Achilles is referred to as hunting on Mt Pelion, and it is highly probable that the allusion is to this play. It was in his cave on Mt Pelion that Achilles was reared by Chiron after he was abandoned by his mother (fr. 151): see Eratosth. catast. 40. A curious coincidence with the account in Apollodorus (3. 171) may be noted: ὁ δὲ (scil. Χείρων) λαβὼν αὐτὸν ἔτρεφε σπλάγχνοις λεόντων καὶ σὺν ὧν ἀγρίων καὶ ἀρκτων μυελοῖς καὶ ὠνύμασιν Ἀχιλλεῖα κτέ. In the well-known description of Pindar (Nem. 3. 43—52) we find κάπρους τ' ἐναίρει, but also that the speed of Achilles was such that he slew stags ἄνευ κυνῶν. Nauck thinks that Steph. Byz. p. 521, 10 λέγεται καὶ κτητικὸν Πηλιωτικὸν refers to this fragment. Cf. Stat. Achill. 2. 410.—For τρέφος: θρέμμα, like δέρος (fr. 11): δέρμα, βλέπος: βλέμμα, see Blaydes on Ar. Nub. 1176.

155

γλώσσης μελίσση τῇ κατερρηκότη

155 μελίσση Ellendt: μελίσσης codd.

155 Schol. Soph. O. C. 481 ὕδατος, μελίσσης] ὕδατος καὶ μέλιτος· ἀπὸ γὰρ τοῦ ποιοῦντος τὸ ποιοῦμενον· καὶ ἐν Ἑρασταῖς 'γλώσσης...κατερρηκότη.'

Nauck says 'versus corrupti medelam desidero.' But for the silence or hesitation of previous editors, I should have thought that the remedy was obvious. Campbell, who half-heartedly suggests γλώσσαν or γλώσση, thinks that the text may be construed, 'with honey from his tongue.' But γλώσσης depends on the verb, and it is strange he should not have observed that ρεῖν and its compounds require the dative (or less commonly the acc.) of the flowing liquid: Eur. Tro. 16 φόνω καταρρεῖ, Bacch. 142, Hom. X 149 etc. The corruption of μελίσση to μελίσσης is hardly to be wondered at. The correction occurred to me independently, before I found that it had been made by Ellendt and Blaydes. Wecklein also (Berlin. philol. Woch. 1890 p. 656) proposed γλώσσαν μελίσση, comparing At. 9 κάρη | στάζων ἰδρωτί. Herwerden's remedy γλώσσης μελίσση δση τις ἐρρύηκέ σοι, afterwards improved to μελίσση σῆς κατερρήχη δση, is unnecessarily violent. The same remark applies to Gompertz's γλώσσης μέλισσα τάνθρος ἐρρήν κάτα. The metaphor was familiar: cf. μελίγηνος, μελιγλωσσος. In Homer of Nestor (A. 248) λιγὺς Πυλῶν ἀγορητῆς, | τοῦ καὶ ἀπὸ γλώσσης μέλιτος γλυκίων ῥένει αὐδῆ), who may be the person described here: Eur. fr. 899 εἰ μοι τὸ Νεστώρειον εὐγλωσσον μέλι (Barnes for μέλιος) ...δοῖν θεός. Poets are constantly compared to bees: see Jebb on Bacchyl. 9. 10. Theocr. 1. 146 πλήρῃς τοι μέλιτος τὸ καλὸν στόμα, Θύρσι, γένοιτο. Sophocles himself was called the Attic bee (Suid. s.v.: cf. schol. Ar. Vesp. 460), and it was said of him Σοφοκλέους τοῦ μελιτι τὸ στόμα κεχρισμένου (vif. § 13). Xenophon, whose speech was melle dulcior (Cic. or. 32), earned the same appellation (Suid. s.v.). For μέλισσα = μέλι see on fr. 1064 λίβανος.

156

ὁ δὲ ἐνθ' ὅπλοις ἀρρώξω Ἡφαίστου τέχνη

156 ἀρρώξω Bergk: ἀρώξω vel ἄρωξω Choerob. | τέχνη Dindorf: τεχνίτου Choerob. σοφοῦ | θεῶν post Ἡφαίστου add. Mekler

156 Choerob. in Theod. p. 463, 29 (p. 415, 4 Hilgard) = Bekk. anecd. p. 1267 (cf. anecd. Par. 1 p. 396, 28) αἱ μέντοι μεταπεπλασμένα δοτικαὶ πληθυντικαὶ προπαροξινεσθαὶ θέλουσιν οἷον προβάτοις πρῆβασιν... ὑπεσταλμένου τοῦ ἀρρώξω, ὥσπερ παρὰ Σοφοκλέϊ ἐν Ἀχιλλέως ἐρασταίς· 'ὁ δὲ ἐνθ'... τεχνίτου'· τοῦτο γὰρ κατὰ μεταπλασμὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἀρρήκτοις γενόμενον, τοῦ ἢ τραπέντος εἰς τὸ ὦ, προπερισπᾶται καὶ οὐ παροξινεῖται. Part of the quotation is also found in Choerob. in Theod. p. 367, 32 (p. 339, 17 Hilgard) ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀρρώξω ὅπλοις· τὸ ἀρρώξω ἀρσενικὸν ὃν τῷ ὅπλοις τῷ οὐδετέρῳ συνετάγη.

ὁ δὲ ἐνθ' has been naturally suspected. Bergk conjectured ὁ δ' ἐν θ', and Lobeck (Patalip. p. 287) ἐνδύνθ'. The latter view, —an alternative would be ὁ δὲ | ἐνδύς— is attractive, as applied to Achilles putting on the armour forged by Hephaestus; but ἐνδύναι is regularly followed by the acc., and Lobeck can produce no better parallel than Quint. 9. 68 δῶσαν ἐν έντεσι. Mekler suggests ἐλοένθ'—ἀρρώξω. The adj., which occurs also in Ant. 251, is not well suited to the neut. ὅπλοις; but to speak of 'metaplasm' is beside the mark. See on Eur. Hel. 1301 δρομάδι κώλω, Phoen. 1024. Jebb on Trach. 930 ἀμφιπλήγι φασγάνῳ.

τέχνη: abstract for concrete, of a work of art. So O. C. 472 κρατῆρες εἰσιν, ἀνδρὲς εὐχείρους τέχνην, and in Latin: Hor. Carm. 4. 8. 5 divite me scilicet artium, | quas aut Parrhasius protulit aut Scopas and other exx. quoted in Thesaurus 11 673, 9 ff. This use of τέχνην probably always prevailed in artistic circles, as it is common in later Greek.

157

ὁμμάτων ἀπο

λόγχας ἦσιν.

157 ὁμμάτων ἀπο | λόγχας Casaubon: ὁμματοπάλογχα cod. | ἦσιν Nauck: φησιν cod., ἀφίησιν vel ἀφίεις Dindorf

157 Hesych. III p. 203 καὶ ἐν Ἀχιλλέως ἐρασταίς· ὁμματοπάλογχα φησιν. For the remainder of the gloss see on fr. 801. The shafts launched from the eyes which inflict the wound of love are fully illustrated on fr. 474. To the passages there quoted add Xen. mem. 1. 3. 13 ἴσως δὲ καὶ οἱ ἔρωτες ταξῆσαι διὰ τοῦτο καλοῦνται, ὅτι καὶ πρόσωθεν οἱ καλοὶ τιτρώσκουσιν. Plat. symph. 219 B (entirely misinterpreted by Stallbaum) ἀφίεις ὥσπερ βέλη τετρώσθαι αὐτὸν ψῆμν. Arsen. pron. 171 γυναικὸς ὁμμα τοῖς ἀκμάζουσιν βέλος. Aristaeen. ep. 1 εὐστόχως ἐπιτοξένειν ταῖς τῶν ὁμμάτων βολαῖς. Musaeus 95 ἀπ' ὀφθαλμοῖς βολῶν | κάλλος δλισθαίνει, καὶ ἐπὶ φρένας ἀνδρὸς ὀδεύει. Dindorf supports his conj. (see cr. n.) by the phrase ἕμερον ἀφίεις applied to the ἐρώμενος in Poll. 3. 71. R. Ellis preferred ὁμμάτων πόθῳ | λ. ἦσιν, modified by Blaydes to πόθου | ἦσι λόγχας.

ΔΑΙΔΑΛΟΣ

The plot of the play is entirely unknown except in so far as a conjecture may be founded on the references to Talos¹: see the nn. on frs. 160 and 161. I believe that fr. 162, which Nauck hesitates to attribute to Sophocles, was also an allusion to the brazen giant.

The only mythical incident connected with the name of Talos is that which relates to the home-coming of the Argonauts and is described in Apoll. Rhod. 4. 1638—1688: cf. Apollod. 1. 140 f. When Jason and his comrades desired to land in Crete, they were prevented by Talos, the brazen warder, who according to certain authorities had been given by Hephaestus to Minos, and whose duty it was to make a circuit of the island three times a day for the purpose of protecting it from strangers. Talos pelted the ship with rocks, and the Argo was obliged to sheer off. But Medea undertook to remove the obstacle, and, after invoking the destructive Keres, swift hounds of Death, to visit his eyes with destruction, made use of all her magical skill against the enemy. The result was that Talos struck his ankle against a pointed rock, and burst the σῦριγξ which contained his supply of vital energy—ἐκ δὲ οἱ ἰχώρ | τηκομένῳ ἵκελος μολίβῳ ῥέεν (1679 f.). Fr. 161 suggests that this narrative may have been the central incident of the Sophoclean play. Talos is rationalized in [Plat.] Minos 320 C.

The evidence that Daedalus was a representative title of Hephaestus is slight; but, though it is not universally admitted, there are insufficient grounds for contesting the identification: see C. Robert in Pauly-Wissowa IV 1995, Malten ib. VIII 360, and Bury on Pind. Nem. 4. 59. In Eur. Her. 471, where Kirchhoff, Dindorf, and Nauck retained Δαίδαλον, Wilamowitz accepted Hermann's δαίδαλον. If we assume that Daedalus-Hephaestus, as the artificer of Talos, was a prominent personage in the play, there is the more reason for admitting the suitability of a satyr-chorus in view of the cult-fellowship of Hephaestus with Dionysus, and of his association with the donkey and the phallus (Malten u.s. 356, Gruppe, pp. 245, 1306, 1311).

¹ Robert merely says that the Daedalus 'auf Kreta gespielt zu haben scheint' (Pauly-Wissowa IV 2006). Wagner suggested that the plot was similar to that of Euripides' Cretans.

158

ἴλλει μὲν εἴσω τόνδ' ἀχαλκεύτῳ πέδῃ

158 ἴλλει μὲν (εἴλλει μὲν vel εἰλλῶμεν Diels) εἴσω van Leeuwen: ἐλλημενήσω cod., ἔλλομεν εἴσω Nauck, εἰλήσομεν σε Nicole | τόν δ' ἔα χαλκευτῷ cod., τῇδ' ἀχαλκεύτῳ Nicole

158 Schol. Gen. Hom. Φ 282 Πτολεμαῖος ὁ Ἀσκαλωνίτης ἐρχθέντα δασέως ἀπὸ γὰρ τῆς ἔρσης. Κράτης εἰλήντ' ἐν μεγάλῳ. ἴλλειν (ἱαλείν cod.) γὰρ φησὶν εἶναι τὸ εἶργειν, ὥστε τὴν τῆς καλύσεως δίκην ἐξούλης καλεῖσθαι... ὁ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Δαίδαλῳ 'ἐλλημενήσω τόν δ' ἔα χαλκευτῷ πέδῃ.'

ἴλλει. The question between the forms ἴλλω and εἴλλω, for εἰλλῶ and the aspirated forms are to be rejected for reasons given by Rutherford, Νεῦ Ρητυνίχης, p. 89 f., is not easy to decide. There is no epigraphic evidence, and that of the MSS is worthless; for even the best vacillate, and Jebb's inference (Ant., p. 251) in favour of ἴλλω is weakened by the fact that R does not support ἴλλε in Ar. Nucl. 762. Cobet was emphatic in advocating ἴλλω, brushing aside all the instances of εἴλλω as mere blunders of the scribes: see Misc. Crit. p. 272, where he sums up his earlier discussions. Rutherford thought that the error τίσαι (for τίσαι) favoured the genuineness of εἴλλω. But surely the converse error is equally well established. Kuehner-Blass (II 413)

follow a good grammatical tradition in distinguishing ἴλλω to wrap from εἴλλω to drive: see Simplic. on Arist. de caelo 231^b 22 τὸ δὲ Ἰλλομένην εἶπε διὰ τοῦ ἰ γράφουτο τὸ δεδεμένην δηλοῖ—εἶπε διὰ τῆς εἰ διφθόγγου γράφουτο, καὶ οὕτως εἰργομένην δηλοῖ, ὡς καὶ Αἰσχύλος ἐν Βασσάrais (fr. 25). Unfortunately, this does not help us here; for although the meaning is clear—'he confines him with fetters no smith has forged', we cannot tell whether the verb should be so written as to conform to the literal sense of πέδαι or not. I write ἴλλει, but without much confidence.—ἀχαλκεύτῳ πέδῃ. The same oxytonon (ἀχαλκεύτους πέδαι) is applied by Aesch. Cho. 491 to the ἀμφίβληστρον in which Agamemnon was ensnared by Clytaemnestra, and by Eur. fr. 595 to the constraint imposed by αἰδώς.

R. Holland interpreted ἴλλειν of forcing an entrance into the island guarded by Talos. I should rather have guessed that the line referred to the labyrinth, which enclosed its prisoners with a new kind of compulsion.

159

τεκτόναρχος μοῦσα

159 Pollux 7. 117 ἐπεὶ δὲ καὶ τοὺς οἰκοδόμους τέκτονας Ὀμηρος (Z 315) καλεῖ, καὶ ἀρχιτέκτων εἰρηται παρὰ Πλάτωνι (polit. 259 E): βιαία γὰρ ἡ ἐν τῷ Σοφοκλέους Δαίδαλῳ 'τεκτόναρχος μοῦσα.'

The context indicates that Pollux only criticized the formation adopted by Sophocles as forced, and βιαίος as a grammarians' word often means very little (Rutherford, Annotation, p. 319).—The muse is the chief of the builders of verse: Pind. Pyth. 3. 113 ἐξ ἐπέων κελαδενῶν, | τέκτονες οἳα σοφοὶ ἄρρισσαν, γιγνώσκομεν. Nem. 3. 4 μελιγαρόων τέκτονες κώμων νεαῖαι (of the singers). Ar. Eq. 530 τέκτονες εὐπαλάμων ὕμνων. Ar. Ran. 1004 πυργώσας ῥήματα σεμνά, referring to Aeschylus, implies magniloquence. Milton's (Lycid. 11) 'build the lofty rhyme' has familiarized the metaphor in English. In Latin condere carmen and the like were common: see Thesaurus IV 153. The view of R. Holland that Daedalus in these words was invoking the assistance of the goddess in the building of his flying-machine seems improbable. Nauck unnecessarily suggests τεκτονουργός on the strength of Hesych. IV p. 138 τεκτονουργός ἀρχιτέκτων. Ellendt renders 'qui arti fabrilis praest'; but the Muse could not be described as the patroness of carpenters.

[σαρδάνιος γέλως]

160 Schol. Plat. rep. 337 A ἀνεκάγχασέ τε μάλα σαρδάνιον]. Σιμωνίδης δὲ (fr. 202 A, PLG III 524) ἀπὸ Τάλω τοῦ χαλκοῦ, ὃν Ἡφαίστος ἐδημιούργησε Μίνω φύλακα τῆς νήσου ποιήσασθαι, <ὃν> ἐμψυχον ὄντα τοὺς πελάζοντας φησι κατακαίοντα ἀναιρεῖν. ὅθεν ἀπὸ τοῦ σεσηρέναι διὰ τὴν φλόγα τὸν σαρδάνιον φησι λεχθῆναι γέλωτα. ὁμοίως καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Δαϊδάλῳ.

It is a legitimate inference from this passage that Sophocles introduced Talos as preventing intruders from entering Crete by consuming them with fiery heat, and also that the phrase σαρδάνιος γέλως occurred in connexion with the grimaces of the scorched victims. Being constructed entirely of bronze he was able to make himself red-hot in the fire, so that he could destroy with his embrace anyone who came near him. For the isolated and obscure phrase σαρδάνιος (or σαρδόνιος) γέλως, which occurs first in Hom. v 302 μείδῃσε δὲ θυμῷ | σαρδάνιον μάλα τοῖον, two derivations were current in antiquity. One of these referred it to the island of Sardinia, where a plant was said to grow so bitter that, when tasted, it caused convulsive spasms and involuntary laughter (cf. Pausan. 10. 17. 13, Tzetz. Lycophr. 796, Serv. Verg. Ecl. 7. 41 etc.); the other simply connected the adjective with σεσηρέναι. The first derivation, although it has influenced the spelling, is clearly fictitious; but the second may contain an element of truth (Adam on Plat. L.c.), although Monro considered that the phrase must be traced either to a proper name, or to some foreign—Egyptian or Phoenician—word, which had become proverbial. It is further to be noticed that the phrase is not always employed in the same sense; for it is applied not only to the sinister smile of vindictive triumph (Hom., Plat.), but also to the forced smile of the sufferer (cf. Cic. Fam. 7. 25. 1: the distinction made in Tyrrell's note cannot be maintained). It appears from the text that the latter was the sense in Simonides and Sophocles. But the other evidence affecting Simonides does not agree entirely with the schol. Plat. Thus Phot. lex. p. 500, 24 = Suid. s.v. σαρδάνιος γέλως....

Σιμωνίδης δὲ τὸν Τάλω τὸν ἡφαιστότευκτον Σαρδόνιον οὐ βουλομένους περαιῶσαι πρὸς Μίνω εἰς πῦρ καθαλλόμενον, ὡς ἂν χαλκοῦν, προστεριζόμενον (l. προστεριζόμενον) ἀναιρεῖν ἐπιχάσκοντας. The words οὐ βουλομένους and the introduction of Σαρδόνιος are unintelligible. Bernhardt (on Suid.), who records other conjectures, suggests the omission of οὐ: I would rather omit Σαρδόνιος altogether as the blundering addition of someone who wanted to bring in Sardinia at all hazards, as if ἐπιχάσκοντας were not enough, and read τοὺς βουλομένους for οὐ βουλομένους. The result would tally with the text, but it is impossible to regard the account of Zenob. 5. 85 as anything but a deliberate attempt to conflate the two etymologies: Σιμωνίδης δὲ φησι τὸν Τάλω πρὸ τῆς εἰς Κρήτην ἀφίξεως οἰκῆσαι τὴν Σαρδῶ καὶ πολλοὺς τῶν ἐν ταύτῃ διαφθεῖραι, οὓς τελευτῶντας σεσηρέναι, καὶ ἐκ τούτου ὁ Σαρδόνιος γέλως. The matter is of some importance not only because Bergk rests the version of Simonides upon the statements of Phot.-Suid. and Zenob., and neglects altogether the more trustworthy evidence of the schol. Plat., but also as affecting our estimate of the credit due to these authorities,—and more particularly to the source of Zenobius. Although Sophocles is mentioned only by the schol. Plat., the natural inference is that his account of Talos was similar to that of Simonides. It should be added that Apollod. 1. 140 says of Talos, who is introduced in the course of the story of the Argonauts: οὗ δὲ ὑπὸ Ἡφαίστου Μίνωι δοθῆναι, ὃς ἦν χαλκοῦς ἀνὴρ.

It is worth while to notice that the explanations already quoted by no means exhaust the ingenuity devoted to the elucidation of σαρδάνιος γέλως. Thus the schol. on v 302 also explains it by reference to Talos, whom he describes as the watchman made by Hephaestus and given by Zeus to Europa to punish anyone landing in Crete. πῶδῶντα γὰρ εἰς πῦρ καὶ θερμαίνοντα τὸ στήθος περιπτύσσεσθαι αὐτοῖς ὧν καιόμενων, ἐκείνον σεσηρέναι. As in the text of Homer, the laughter is that of the avenger. Sardinia was brought in by Timaeus (FHG I 199), who tells a strange story of the old men being buried alive and laughing at their prospective happiness; and by Demon (FHG I 380), who speaks of the most handsome captives and the old men over 70 being sacrificed to Cronos, and laughing at their own courage. Another fragment of Timaeus (schol. Lycophr. 790, FHG I 199), describing the sacrifice of the old men, makes their sacrificers laugh, while they beat them with clubs and thrust them over the precipice. [For the reference of this story to 'Aeschylus' περὶ παροιμιῶν in Zenob. 5. 85 see Crusius, Anal. crit. paroem. p. 148.] Clitarchus preferred the derivation from σεσηπέναι, explaining that it was the custom of the Carthaginians, when sacrificing their children to Cronos, to place them in the arms of a brazen idol, with a heated oven burning beneath (schol. Plat., Phot. etc.).

There is a special treatise by L. Mercklin, entitled Die Talostage u. das sardoniche Lachen, Petersb. 1851, which I have not been able to see. For the assumed identity of Hephaestus and Daedalus see Introductory Note.

161

[Τάλω εἵμαρτο τελευτῆσαι]

161 Schol. Apoll. Rhod. 4. 1638 ὁ Τάλως ἐπὶ τοῦ σφυροῦ σύριγγα εἶχεν ὑμένι περιεχομένην. σύριγξ δὲ λέγεται ἡ περόνη. ὅτι δὲ εἵμαρτο αὐτῷ τελευτῆσαι λέγει Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Τάλῳ. τὸν δὲ Τάλῳ τὸν φύλακα τοῦ Μίνω τρεῖς μὲν ἐν ἡμέρᾳ πᾶσαν περιπαλεῖν τὴν Κρήτην τηλικαύτην οὖσαν, τὴν δὲ ζωὴν μόνον τῶν ἐμψύχων τούτων ἐν τῷ σφυρῷ κεκτῆσθαι.

The scholia were edited from the Laurentianus by H. Keil in the second volume of Merkel's Apollonius (1854). They are stated in the subscriptio to be derived from Lucillus Tarrhaeus, Sophocles, and Theon: for the course of tradition see Wilamowitz, Einleitung, p. 186. The text as given in Weillauer's edition from the codd. Flor. and Paris. often shews differences of language, but not much important divergence. Dindorf quotes the above extract from Brunck.

For ἐν Τάλῳ Brunck substituted ἐν Δαιδάλῳ, but this is probably one of the cases where the name of a leading character was substituted for the title of the play: see fr. 125.

It has been suggested in the Introductory Note that the story of the death of Talos as told in the Argonautica may have been a leading incident in the play. Apollod. 1. 140 describes the σύριγξ thus: εἶχε δὲ φλέβα μίαν ἀπὸ αὐχένος κατατείνουσαν ἄχρι σφυρῶν, κατὰ δὲ τὸ δέρμα τῆς φλεβὸς ἦλος διήρευστο χαλκοῦ. He gives three different versions of the death of Talos, none of which agrees with that of Apollonius: (1) he became mad through the magic potions of Medea; (2) Medea promised to make him immortal and drew out the nail, so that all his vital fluid (ιχώρ) escaped; (3) Poes wounded him in the ankle with an arrow.

162

ἀλλ' οὐδὲ μὲν δὴ κύνθαρος
τῶν Αἰτναίων < γε > πάντως

162. 1 οὐδὲ V: οὐ cett. 2 γε addidi

162 Schol. Ar. Pac. 73 μεγάλοι λέγονται εἶναι κατὰ τὴν Αἰτνὴν κύνθαροι, μαρτυροῦσιν δὲ οἱ ἐπιχώριοι... Σοφοκλῆς Δαιδάλῳ 'ἀλλ'... πάντως,' λέγει δὲ πάντως εἰκάδων εἰς μέγαν.

The sense may be rendered: 'well, it certainly isn't a beetle,—not one from Aetna anyhow.' R. Holland thinks that the remark was made by Talos of Daedalus as he flew away; I should rather suppose that it was a comment on the appearance of Talos himself.—Jebb on O. C. 312 Αἰτναίος ἐπὶ πῶλον βεβῶσαν thinks that the Αἰτναίος μέγιστος κύνθαρος of Ar. Pac. 73 was not a mere joke on the Aetnaean breed of horses, but an allusion to a species of beetle actually found there. The evidence seems to me to point in the opposite direction, and also to indicate that the joke in the time of Aristophanes was a somewhat musty one. If not, it is odd that the four illustrations quoted by the scholiast are all of a comic character; that, if everyone knew that there really was an Aetnaean beetle, Plato the comic poet should have thought it worth while to say that it was reported to be bigger than a man (fr. 37, 1 610 K.); and also that the Sicilian Epicharmus (fr. 76 δ Πυγμαρίων λοχαγὸς ἐκ τῶν κανθάρων | τῶν μεθόνων οὐς φαντι τὸν Αἰτναν ἔχειν) should mention a report that there were big beetles on Aetna. The remaining passage is Aesch. fr. 233 Αἰτναῖός ἐστι κανθαρος βία πόνων (or πονῶν), from the satyric Σίσυφος πετροκυλιστής. In any case, there is nothing to justify Nauck in questioning the authenticity of the fragment. On the other hand, I see no reason to disbelieve the repeated statement (Hesych. i p. 88 etc.) that the Aetnaean horses were a big, as well as a good breed: see also on fr. 672. The starting-point of comparison was probably κάνθων: Greg. Cyp. 2. 24 Αἰτναῖον κάνθωνα τὸν μέγαν.—ἀλλ' οὐδὲ μὲν δὴ rejects an alternative, as in El. 913, Ai. 877, Trach. 1128 ἀλλ' οὐδὲ μὲν δὴ τοῖς γ' ἐφ' ἡμέραν ἐρεῖς. I have added γε partly for obvious metrical reasons, and partly because it gives to Αἰτναίων exactly that slight stress which seems to be required: see Trach. loc., Ar. Nucl. 126 ἀλλ' οὐδ' ἐγὼ μέντοι πῶσόν γε κείσομαι, Plat. Symp. 197 A καὶ μὲν δὴ τὴν γε τῶν ζώων ποιήσω.—The penultimate syllable of Αἰτναίων was probably shortened: cf. fr. 956 n.—πάντως more often precedes the negative, 'certainly not' rather than 'not anyhow': but cf. Ar. Pac. 1147 οὐ γὰρ οἶόν τ' ἐστὶ πάντως οἰναρίζειν τήμερον. Herwerden deleted the word, thinking that its proper place is only with λέγει (dicat opinio). Dindorf conjectured ἀλλ' οὐ μὲν δὴ κανθαρος οὗτος, coll. El. 103.

163

γοργάδων

163 Hesych. i p. 442 γοργάδων· ἀλιάδων. Δαυδάω Σοφοκλῆς. ibid. γοργίδες· αἱ ὤκεανίδες. Zonar. p. 448 γοργάδες· αἱ δέσποναι.

The adj. γοργός appears originally to have meant 'flashing' (Eur. Phoen. 146 n.), but the transition to 'fierce, terrible (to look at)' is easy: cf. Γοργώ, γοργώπις. Some modern scholars have used this evidence in support of their theory that the Gorgons were originally sea-nymphs (Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 186.)

who dwelt on the shore of the western sea (Roscher, Lex. ii 1694); but it is sufficient to say that the epithet is naturally applied to the miraculous beings of sailor's stories. Gruppe (p. 1209) suggests a comparison with the Haliae, who fought with Dionysus against Perseus (Pausan. 2. 22. 1). In Lycophr. 1349 ἡ παλιμφρων Γοργάς is supposed to be Hera. It should be added that Gorgo is often mated with Poseidon.

164

ἐσέφθην

164 Hesych. ii p. 201 ἐσέφθην· ἐσεβάσθην, ἡσύχασα, ἡσυχύσθην. Σοφοκλῆς Δαυδάω (Palmer for παιδάω). Phot. lex. p. 19. 7 ἐσέφθην· τὸ ἐσεβάσθην. Σοφοκλῆς. Choerob. in Theod. p. 489, 21 (p. 20, 23 Hilgard) σημειοῦμεθα παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ καὶ παρὰ Πλάτῳ (Phaedr. 254 B) τὸ ἐσέφθην καὶ τὸ σεφθεῖσα. ἐσεβδθην is erroneously adduced from Sophocles in Cramer, anecd. Oxon. iv p. 338, 17.

This is the aor. of the deponent σέβομαι, and so is σεφθεῖσα, which is used absolutely in Plat. Phaedr. = in adoration (cf. Porph. vit. Plot. 12). A similarly isolated form ἐσεβίσθην occurs in O.C. 636 ἀγὼ σεβίσθεις. The later ἐσεβάσθην, recognized above by the grammarians, is attested by A. P. 7. 122 Πυθαγόρης τί τὸσον κυνάμων ἐσεβάσθην; The use of the so-called 'passive' form with an active meaning is actually a survival from the time when this aorist form was associated with the active voice: see Brugmann, Gr. Gramm. § 150. For other illustrations see on fr. 837, 2 δερχθέντες.

ΔΑΝΑΗ

On the question raised by this title and its relation to the Acrisius see the Introductory Note to that play (p. 38). Of the fragments attributed to the Danae fr. 165 alone is significant, and that, while agreeing well enough with Jacobs's assumption, seems to be decisive against a solution which otherwise might have deserved consideration, that the Danae was parallel in construction to the Dictys of Euripides, and was concerned with the events in Seriphos. For Wagner, who adopted the last-named hypothesis, failed to show that the words of fr. 165 have any appropriateness in the mouth of Polydectes, to whom he would assign them.

165

οὐκ οἶδα τὴν σὴν πείραν· ἐν δ' ἐπίσταμαι, τοῦ παιδὸς ὄντος τοῦδ' ἐγὼ διόλλυμαι.

165 Schol. Soph. Αἰ. 1 πείρα γὰρ ἡ βλάβη, ὡς καὶ ἐν Δανάῃ 'οὐκ...διόλλυμαι.' The same words occur in Suid. s.v. πείρα, who has οὐδ' in place of ἐν δ'.

The extract may be taken to come from a scene between Acrisius and Danae, after the discovery of the birth of Perseus, in which Danae had pleaded that she had been the victim of forcible usage. Acrisius would then reply: 'I know nothing of the attempt you tell me of, but only that, if this child lives, I am undone.' In Ar. Av. 583 τοὺς ὀφθαλμοὺς ἐκκοψάντων ἐπὶ πείρα the schol. gives the same explanation ἐπὶ βλάβη. The verb πειρᾶν is used c. acc. of forcible attempts upon women: Ar. Eq. 517. Phot. lex. p. 405, 19 πειρᾶν· τὸ πειράζειν ἐπὶ φθορᾷ καὶ συνουσίᾳ· Μένανδρος. Moeris p. 207, 2 πειρᾶν τὴν παῖδα Ἀττικοί, πειράζων διαφθείρων Ἕλληνες. So the noun in A.P. 12. 251 πρόσθε μὲν ἀντιπρόσωπα φιλήματα καὶ τὰ πρὸ πείρας | εἶχονεν. For τὴν σὴν cf. El. 1110 οὐκ οἶδα τὴν σὴν κληδόν'. ἀλλὰ μοι γέρων | ἐφέϊτ' κτέ., Αἰ. 792 οὐκ οἶδα τὴν σὴν πρᾶξιν, Αἰαντος δ' ὄτι...οὐ θαρσῶ πέρι. So Eur. Hclid. 284 τὸ σὸν γὰρ Ἄργος οὐ δέδοικ' ἐγὼ (n.), Rhes. 866 οὐκ οἶδα τοὺς σοὺς οὓς λέγεις Ὀδυσσεάς | ἡμεῖς δ' ὕπ' ἐχθρῶν οὐδενὸς πεπλήγμεθα, Aesch. fr. 14 κάγωγε τὰς σὰς βακκάρεις τε καὶ μύρα. Meineke (Anal. Soph. p. 274) conjectured τῆς παιδὸς ὄντως τῆσδ', supposing that Zeus was speaking of his passion for Danae.

166

γόνοισι μῆλων κάφροδισίαν ἄγραν

166 γόνοισι scripti: γόνουον cod., γόνον τε Musurus, γονῆν τε coni. Nauck

166 Hesych. I p. 339 ἀφροδισία ἄγρα· Σοφοκλῆς Δανάῃ 'γόνουον...ἄγραν.' οἱ μὲν τοὺς πέρδικας, οἱ δὲ (δὲ cod.: corr. Musurus) πρὸς τὸν καθαρὸν ἀρμόζουσιν, τῇ δὲ θηλείᾳ παλεῖοντες αἰρῶσιν αὐτοὺς. κακῶς δέ· χοίρω γὰρ καθαίρουσι καὶ ἀρνίῳ, ἀλλ' οὐ πέρδικῃ. λέγει οὖν τὴν τῶν συνῶν διὰ τὸ καταφερέεσθαι τὸ ζῶον πρὸς συνουσίαν.

καπρᾶν γε τοι καὶ κάπραιναν ἀπὸ τούτου (i.e. they are derived from καταφερέεσθαι: see Hesych. II p. 409). δύναται δὲ καὶ τὴν τῶν αἰγῶν γονῆν δηλοῦν. καὶ γὰρ καὶ τοῦτο τὸ ζῶον λίαν ἐπτόχηται πρὸς τὰ ἀφροδισία· ὥστε καὶ εἰς ἐαυτὸ ὀβριζεῖν. The phrase ἀφροδισία ἄγρα is referred to elsewhere, but without any light being thrown on the obscurities of Hesych.: Bekk. anecd. p. 472, 22 ἀφροδισία ἄγρα· οἱ πέρδικες, διὰ τὸ τοὺς θηρώντας τῇ θηλείᾳ ἐπιβουλεύοντας αἰρεῖν αὐτοὺς. Eustath. II. p. 1183, 19 λέγεται δέ, φασι, καὶ ἀφροδισία ἄγρα καθὰ πέρδιξ, οὕτω καὶ σὺς· καὶ γὰρ καὶ ὁ χοῖρος κατωφερὴς εἰς ἀφροδισία. Macar. 2. 70 ἀφροδισία ἄγρα· ἐπὶ τῶν ἔρωτι ἀλισκομένων.

The proper inference to be drawn from the difficult text of Hesychius is that Sophocles used the phrase ἀφροδισία ἄγρα without clearly specifying in the context to what class of animal it applied. Some commentators held that partridges, 'which of course (δὴ appears to be used ironically) are suitable for purification,' must be meant, because their uxoriousness is made a snare to entrap them. But Diogenianus, if he was Hesychius' original, argued that the partridge must be excluded, because, though a pig or a sheep might be sacrificed for the purpose of καθαρός, a partridge could not. He concludes that the pig (or possibly the goat) is the animal intended. It is surely implied in this statement that the context in Sophocles was concerned with a sacrifice of purification, although the words relating to it are not quoted. The sexual propensities of the partridge are mentioned in Arist. hist. an. 1. 1. 13, 9. 2; and in Ael. nat. an. 3. 5, 16; 4. 1; 7. 19. Cf. Plin. n. h. 10. 33. 100—102. The pig was the victim most commonly selected in purificatory rites: cf. Aesch. Eum. 283 καθαροῖς ἡλάθη (scil. μῆλα) χοιροκτόνοις, ibid. 453, and see Stengel, Kultusaltertümer, p. 145. At Tanagra Hermes freed the town from a plague by carrying a ram round the walls on his shoulder (Pausan. 9. 22. 1).

γόνουσι. I prefer this to γόνον τε (see cr. n.) as more likely to have been corrupted to γόνουσι, especially with μῆλων following. I cannot follow M. Schmidt's argument that the words γόνουσι μῆλων ought to be rejected altogether; and his transposition of the words οἱ δὲ...ἀρμόζουσι so as to follow αἰρούσιν αὐτοὺς does not yield a satisfactory sense. R. Ellis conjectured γονεῖα.

167

ζῆ, πῖνε, φέρβου

167 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 97, 32 ζῆ ἀντὶ τοῦ ζῆθι...Σοφοκλῆς Δανάη 'ζῆ, πῖνε, φέρβου'.

No doubt the sentiment was 'Let us eat and drink; for to-morrow we die.' It was a commonplace of proverbial philosophy. Theogn. 1047 νῦν μὲν πίνοντες τερπόμεθα, καλὰ λέγοντες | ἄσφα δ' ἐπειτ' ἔσται, ταῦτα θεοῖσι μέλει. Eur. Alc. 788 εὐφραине σαντῶν, πῖνε, τὸν καθ' ἡμέραν | βίον λογίζου σόν, τὰ δ' ἄλλα τῆς τύχης. fr. 196. Athen. 530 B, from the epitaph of Sardanapallus: ἐσθιε, πῖνε, παῖζε· ὡς τάλλα τούτου οὐκ ἄξια. Hor. Carm. 1. 9. 13. Sen. controv. 2. 6. 3 convivae certe tui dicunt: bibamus, moriendum est. So often in the Anthology: see A.P. 11. 56, 57, 62.—For the imperative ζῆ see Jebb on Ani. 1169 καὶ ζῆ τύραννον σχῆμ' ἔχων, and cf. Eur. fr. 826 δὲ' ἐλπίδος ζῆ. Cobet points out (N.L. p. 524) that ζῆθι is a late barbarism due to the false analogy of στήθι.

168

αὐθήμερόν

168 Hesych. 1 p. 203 ἀνθήμερον <τῇ> σήμερον ἡμέρα. Σοφοκλῆς Δανάη. Brunck restored αὐθήμερόν (αὐθήμερον Schrevel). The error is an early one, as it is implied in the alphabetical order. αὐθήμερόν occurs also in Aesch. Pers. 459.

169

βράχιστον

169 Antiatl. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 85, 18 βράχιστον· βραχύτατον. Σοφοκλῆς Δανάη. Hesych. I p. 396 βράχιστον· ἐλάχιστον.

βράχιστος is used by Sophocles also in Ant. 1327, and the adv. βράχιστα in O. C.

1115. Pind. Isthm. 5. 59 has ἐν βραχίστοις, and Eur. Suppl. 478 ἐκ βραχιόνων. The usual prose form is, of course, βραχύτατος.

170

δεδαιμονισμένον

170 Antiatl. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 90, 31 δαιμονίζεσθαι. Σοφοκλῆς Δανάη δεδαιμονισμένον ἀντὶ τοῦ τεθεωμένου.

δαιμονίζεσθαι is elsewhere to be possessed: cf. Plut. qu. conv. 7. 5. 4 p. 706 D ὥσπερ γὰρ οἱ μάγοι τοὺς δαιμονισμένους κελεύουσι τὰ ὕψιστα γράμματα πρὸς αὐτοὺς καταλέγειν. Nor is its meaning essentially different in Philémon fr. 191 (II 530 K.) ἄλλος κατ' ἄλλην δαιμονίζεται τύχην, which must be read in connexion with the conception of δαίμων συγγενής or τύχη συγγενής τῷ σώματι (id. fr. 10, II 481 K.). It is impossible to say how Sophocles employed the participle, but the explanation deified is probably misleading, if it is intended to apply to such a case as the translation of Heracles. Blaydes conjectured that τεθειωμένον ('dedicated') should be restored for τεθεωμένον.

ΔΙΟΝΥΣΙΣΚΟΣ ΣΑΤΥΡΙΚΟΣ

From the title and the three extant fragments it is clear that the Dionysiscus represented the god as an infant in his cradle, even then providing for his worshippers the miraculous gift of wine. It was a satyr-play; and the scene was perhaps laid in the fairy-land of Nysa, the home of the nymphs who were the nurses of the god, on the shore of the Ocean stream: see note on fr. 959.

In view of the recent data, which were unknown to Welcker, it is no longer necessary to recall his guesses concerning the story of the play. The infancy of Dionysus as the nursling of the nymphs is described in Hom. h. 26. The subject was often celebrated in works of art: see Gruppe, p. 14351. In Ap. Rhod. 4. 1131 ff. Maeris, the daughter of Aristaëus, received the child from Hermes at her home in Euboea and gave him honey to eat. Silenus, who was probably the speaker in fr. 171, appears as the guardian of the young god also in Pind. fr. 156 ὁ ζαμενῆς δ' ὁ χοροῦτύπος, | δν Μαλεάγονος ἔθρεψε Ναϊδος ἀκοίτας | Σιληνός (see however Schroeder's text). Diod. 4. 4 describes him as παιδαγωγός and τροφεύς of Dionysus. The title, now correctly restored for Διονυσιακός, is parallel to the Ἡρακλίσκος of Theocr. 24: see Crusius in Rh. Mus. XLVIII 153.

171

ὅταν γὰρ αὐτῷ προσφέρω βρώσιν διδούς, τὴν ρῖνάν μ' εὐθὺς ψηλαφᾷ, κἄνω φέρει
τὴν χεῖρα πρὸς <τὸ> φαλακρὸν ἤδ' διαγελῶν.

171. 2 τὴν ρῖνάν εὐθὺς ψηλαφᾷ cod.

3 τὸ add. Blaydes

171 Lex. Messan. f. 283 r. ψηλαφᾷ (ψηλαφᾷ cod.) σύν τῷ ἱ Σοφοκλῆς Διονυσίσκῳ 'ὅταν... διαγελῶν.'

Silenus is probably the speaker: see Introductory Note.

1 προσφέρω, of offering food, as in fr. 502.

2 τὴν ρῖνάν μ': for the double accusative see Phil. 1301 μέθεσ με, πρὸς θεῶν, χεῖρα (with Jebb's n.).

3 Blaydes's addition of the article is no doubt correct, for usage indicates that the neuter is used substantively. H., who made the same correction independently, quoted Herond. 6. 76 τὸ φαλακρὸν κατα-ψῶσα and Athen. 507 c δοκεῖν γὰρ ἐφ' ἣν Πλάτωνα κορώνην γενόμενον ἐπὶ τὴν κεφαλὴν ἀναπηδήσαντα τὸ φαλακρὸν κατασκαρ-φᾶν. Add fr. 314, 359 παύον τὸ λείον φαλακρὸν ἤδονα πινύας. It would hardly be satisfactory to take πρὸς φαλακρὸν as acc. sing. masc. with διαγελῶν, although πρὸς often follows verbs expressing emotion (Trach. 1211, Kaibel on El. p. 198). For the ridicule attaching to baldness cf. Ar. Nub. 540 and the passages collected by Jacobs Anth. IX p. 423, and Mayor on Juv. 4. 38, 5. 171. Blaydes's further conjecture ἡδέως γελῶν is altogether needless.

172

πόθεν ποτ' ἄλυπον ὦδ'
ἡῖρον ἄνθος ἀνίας;

172. 1 sq. ὦδε εὖρον vulgo

172 Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 82, 18 = Bekk. anecd. p. 385, 23 ἄλυπον ἄνθος ἀνίας· εἰ θέλοις εἰπεῖν ἐπὶ (Nauck conj. περί unnecessarily) τῶς πράγματι δ' ἄλυσος ἀπαλλάττει, οὕτως ἂν χρήσαιτο ὡς καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν τῷ Διονυσιακῷ σατυρικῷ (τῷ σατυρικῷ Phot.) ἐπὶ οἴνου πρῶτον γευσάμενον τῶν κατὰ τὸν χορὸν σατύρων· 'πόθεν... ἀνίας'; ἔδον δὲ τὸ μελῦδριον πολιτικὸν ἄγαν γέγονε. μετὰ γὰρ τῆς ἄλλης ἐναργείας λελυμένην ἔχει τὴν ἐρμηνειάν καὶ μεθύουσιν ἀρμόττονσαν. δεῖ δὲ τὰς λύσεις τῆς ἐρμηνείας ἀρμόττειν τοῖς νοήμασι καὶ μὴ σφίγγειν, καὶ μηδαμοῦ σύνδεσμον παρατιθέναι, ἀλλ' ἀκήρατον τὴν λύσιν φυλάττειν. According to Reitzenstein, the extract is ultimately derived from Phrynichus (fr. 162 de B.).

Campbell joins ἄλυπον ἀνίας, leaving ἄνθος isolated and in defiance of the order of the words. He accounts for the latter by strangely interpreting the grammarian as imputing to the poet 'an inebriate looseness of expression,' whereas he actually says that 'the style is abrupt, though clear': see e.g. Demetr. de eloc. 193 διὰ τοῦτο δὲ καὶ Μένανδρον ὑποκρίνονται λελυμένων ἐν τοῖς πλείστοις. The purpose of the note is mainly to illustrate the transferred sense of ἄλυπος, which a few lines above had been glossed by ὁ μὴ λυπούμενος. The words of Soph. are not easy, and Nauck thinks ἄνθος corrupt, proposing ἄκος, but the resulting sense is weak. Tucker conjectured ἀλθος (= φάρμακον), which is approved by

Mekler, and Weil ánōias. I would render 'this sorrow-healing crown of pain,' with an oxymoron like ἐφίμερον κακόν (fr. 149) or Juliet's 'Parting in such sweet sorrow': ánōios ánias is thus exactly parallel to μανίας ánthos in Trach. 999. (Valckenaer and Blaydes introduce μανίας here for ánias.) One may suppose that the satyrs did not appreciate the flavour of the wine, at least until they perceived its effect. But, even apart from this, the potency of the wine-cup may be described as wounding: Pind. fr. 218 δέχονται φρένας ἀμπελίνους τῶςοις δαμέντες. Or it affords a mixture of joy and sorrow: Alcae. fr. 47 ἄλλοτα μὲν μελιάδεος, ἄλλοτα δ' | δένυτέρω τριβόλων ἀρυτήμενοι. We have in fact exactly the same oxymoron as here in Hor. Carm. 3. 21 tu lene tormentum ingenio admovēs | plerumque duro, which is adapted from Bacchyl. fr. 16 J. γλυκεῖ' ἀνάγκα σεσαυμένων κυλίκων θάλασσι θυμόν. For the commonplace to which άλυπον points see on fr. 758. There is not necessarily any reference to the result of excessive wine-drinking, as in Panyassis fr. 14 K. πάσας δ' ἐκ κραδίας ánias ándrōn ἀλαπάξει | πινόμενος κατὰ μέτρον· ὑπὲρ μέτρον δὲ χερείων, and often in the comic poets: see the passages collected in Athen. 36 A foll. The metre is an acephalous Glyconic (Telesilleum) followed by a Pherecratean:

Λ ~ ~ ~ ~ ~
- ~ ~ ~ ~

For similar acephalous cola in Sophocles see J. W. White in Cl. Q. III 300. Schroeder does not always agree in the details (see Soph. cant. p. 83), but the principle may be taken to be established.

173

θωχθείς

173 Hesych. II p. 335 θωχθείς· θωρηχθείς, μεθυσθείς. Σοφοκλῆς Διονυσιακῶ. Cf. Phot. lex. p. 99, 13 θωχθείς· θωραχθείς.

The familiar use of θώραξ, θωρήσσω (Ar. Vesp. 1195, Ach. 1134, Anacreon fr. 147, Theognis 884 etc.), which was explained by the ancients as θερμαίνειν στῆθος, seems to arise from a sufficiently intelligible metaphor. θωχθείς was connected by Ahrens (Dor. 182) with θάξαι from θάγω: cf. Hesych. II p. 300 θάξαι· μεθύσαι. ih. p. 302 θαχθῆμεν· θωρηχθῆναι. Δωριείς. s.vv. τεθαγμένοι, καθθάξαι. But the origin of this word and its relation to θῶσθαι (Etym. M. p. 461, I θῶσθαι λέγουσιν αἱ Δωριεῖς τὸ εὐωχεῖσθαι, Aesch. fr. 49) are alike obscure. Cf. Epicharm. fr. 136 K. θωσοῦμεθα· ὁ Ζεὺς ἀναρρῶει. Alcman fr. 24. 81 θωστήριά θ' ἄμ' ἐπαυεῖ: cf. Hesych. II p. 335 θωστήρια· εὐωχητήρια. See also Hesych. s.vv. θῶνται, θῶξαι, θῶσασθαι, θωθῆναι, θωωθείς, θνωθείς. [In the last two glosses M. Schmidt would restore θωχθείς, but there may have been also a form θωθείς.] Etym. M. p. 460, 31. Etym. Gud. p. 268, 11 θῶ τὸ εὐωχοῦμαι.

ΔΟΛΟΠΕΣ

The Dolopes were a Thessalian tribe, whom Peleus put under the leadership of Phoenix: Hom. I 484 ναῖον δ' ἐσχατιὴν Φθίης, Δολόπεσσι ἀνάσσω. Pindar mentions him as the leader of the Dolopians in war (fr. 184), although, as Strabo (431) points out in quoting the passage, their presence at Troy is not indicated in the Iliad. Another link with the Achilles-story is found in the fact that the inhabitants of Scyros were also Dolopians (Thuc. I. 98, 2). So Tzetzes, Antehom. 175 ἐς Σκύρον, Δολόπων νήσον, Λυκομήδεος ἄστν. Building on this very slender foundation, Welcker (p. 140 ff.) held that the Dolopes and the Phoenix are alternative titles; that the subject of the play was the fetching from Scyros by Phoenix of the young Neoptolemus, against the wishes of Lycomedes and Deidamia; and that the first εἰκὼν of the younger Philostratus follows the Sophoclean tradition. R. Wagner (Epit. Vat. p. 224) agreed with Welcker, without giving any fresh reasons. Inasmuch, however, as there is now good cause to believe that the mission of Odysseus and Phoenix to Scyros was the subject of the Scyrians, Welcker's guess concerning the character of the plot of the Dolopes has no longer any probability. The Dolopians have no place in heroic legends, except as explained above, and only two possibilities seem to be open. Either Dolopes was, as Welcker thought, a secondary title to the Phoenix, but with a plot relating to the earlier adventures of that hero; or, if an independent play, it may have been concerned with the concealment of Achilles in the palace of Lycomedes, and his discovery by the Greek envoys. Fr. 174 is too insecure a prop to support the latter alternative.

174

εὐναῖος εἷη δραπέτην στέγην ἔχων

174 Phot. lex. p. 36, 12 εὐναῖος· ἔγκεκρυμμένος. Σοφοκλῆς Δόλοψιν· εὐναῖος... ἔχων. So also Etym. M. p. 393, 44, where D alone has δραπέτην, the others δραπέτην. Cf. Hesych. II p. 227 εὐναῖος· λαγώς. Σοφοκλῆς Δόλοψι. καπηχῆς (κατεπηχῆς Nauck), I p. 507 δρομαῖος λαγώς· ὁ ἐν δρόμοις ἀλίσκόμενος· εὐναῖος δὲ ὁ ἐν κοίτῃ.

εὐναῖος was applied to the hare in her form)(δρομαῖος, with which cf.
Aesch. Ag. 123. So πτώκα λαγῶν in Hom. X 310 etc. Valckenaer conjectured that λαγῶς immediately preceded εὐναῖος.
Naber proposed εἷη for εἷη, but the context may just as well have required the third person.—δραπέτην στέγην, 'a run-away home,' is one from which the occupant is continually shifting. For the transference of the epithet cf. Phil. 208 αἰδὰ τρυσάνωρ, ib. 695, O. C. 1463 κτύπος διόβολος, At. 611 χερόπλακτοι δοῦποι, ib.

55 πολύκερων· φόνου, Eur. Phoen. 660, 1350 (nn.). A. P. 10. 87 ἂν μὴ γελῶμεν τὸν βίον τὸν δραπέτην is not parallel, since there life is supposed itself to be changing.

Ahrens suggested that the fragment described the outcast condition of Phoenix when an exile.

175

χαμεῖνη

175 Cyrril. lex. ap. Schow. in Hesych.
p. 781 χαμεῖνῃ· ἡ ἐπὶ γῆς κατὰ κλισίαν.
καὶ τὸ ταπεινὸν κλινίδιον χαμεῖνη. Σοφοκλῆς Δόλοψι. Bachm. anecd. I p. 412,

28 χαμεῖνα· ταπεινὴ καὶ εὐτελὴς κλίνη, <ἡ> καὶ στιβάς. The word had already been used by Aeschylus (Ag. 1541) in the figurative sense.

¹ See Introductory Note to the Phoenix.

ΕΛΕΝΗΣ ΑΠΑΙΤΗΣΙΣ

The subject of this play is indicated by the title¹, and was derived from the narrative of the Cypria, as appears from the epitome of Proclus (EGF p. 19): καὶ διαπρεσβεύονται πρὸς τοὺς Τρώας τὴν Ἑλένην καὶ τὰ κτήματα ἀπαιτοῦντες· ὥς δὲ οὐχ ὑπήκουσαν ἐκείνοι, ἐνταῦθα δὴ τειχομαχοῦσιν. According to Proclus, the embassy was subsequent to the landing on the coast of the Troad, and to the deaths of Protesilaus and Cycnus; but Apollodorus (epit. 3. 28) and the scholiast on the Iliad presently to be quoted make it precede the departure from Tenedos. R. Wagner (Epit. Vat. p. 197) conjectured that the latter was an innovation upon the version of the Cypria made by Sophocles himself. The embassy of Odysseus and Menelaus has already been mentioned in the Introductory Note to the Antenoridae (p. 87). They were entertained by Antenor on that occasion, as he himself explained to Helen (Hom. Γ 205 ff.): ἤδη γὰρ καὶ δεῦρό ποτ' ἤλυθε δῖος Ὀδυσσεύς, | σεῦ ἔνεκ' ἀγγελίης, σὺν ἀρηιφίλῳ Μενελάῳ· | τοὺς δ' ἐγὼ ἐξείνισσα καὶ ἐν μεγάροισι φίλησα. In spite of the support of Antenor, the mission was a failure. Paris actually bribed Antimachus to recommend that the envoys should be put to death; but from this danger Antenor succeeded in rescuing them (Λ 139 ff.): ὅς (sc. Ἀντίμαχος) ποτ' ἐνὶ Τρώων ἀγορῇ Μενέλαον ἄνωγεν, | ἀγγελίην ἐλθόντα σὺν ἀντιφῷ Ὀδυσῇ, | αὐτὶ κατακτείνειν μὲν ἐξέμεν ἄψ' ἐς Ἀχαιοὺς. The occasion is identified by schol. A on Hom. Γ 206: πρὸ τοῦ στρατεῦσαι τοὺς Ἕλληνας εἰς Τροίαν ἤλθον πρέσβεις Ὀδυσσεύς καὶ Μενέλαος ἀπαιτοῦντες Ἑλένην, ἐν οἷς (ᾧ conj. Nauck) τῶν ἄλλων αὐτοὺς μεθ' ὕβρεως διωξάντων μόνος Ἀντήνωρ ξενίζει φιλοφρόνως. ὅτε γὰρ ἐκ Τενέδου ἐπρεσβεύοντο οἱ περὶ Μενέλαον, τότε Ἀντήνωρ ὁ Ἰκετάνορος ὑπεδέξατο αὐτοὺς καὶ δολοφονεῖσθαι μέλλοντας ἔσωσεν. The scholiast's words need not be taken to refer to a secret assassination; they may simply point to the treachery of slaying an envoy. Such also appears to be the intention of Ovid's at Paris et fratres et qui rapuere sub illo | vix tenere manus...nefandas (Met. 13. 202 f.). According to Johannes Tzetzes (Antehom. 154 ff.), who includes Palamedes, Acamas, and Diomedes in the number of the envoys, these events occurred before the gathering at Aulis. In the rationalized account which Herodotus received from the Egyptian priests, when Menelaus and his colleagues arrived at Troy on their mission, they received the answer that Helen was not there (2. 118). For the poem of Bacchylides see p. 89.

¹ A play with the same title was written by Timesitheus, who is only known from his notice in Suid. s.v.

Engelmann (Archäol. Stud., Berlin 1900, p. 16) found a representation of certain characters in this play on a vase belonging to the Vatican Museum (Arm. 294), and identified them as Helen and two of her attendants listening to an interview between Odysseus and Antenor, which took place at a temple close to the sea-shore. He concluded from fr. 177 that the embassy arrived after Helen had reached Troy, and referred fr. 176 to Helen or one of her women overhearing the Laconian speech of Menelaus; Welcker¹ had previously inferred from frs. 176 and 178 that a meeting took place between Helen and Menelaus; and that Helen, when her surrender was refused, being now desirous of returning to Greece, contemplated suicide as her last resource.

The connexion between fr. 180 and the events outlined above is not at all obvious; and it does not seem possible that the strife between Calchas and Mopsus, and the former's death after his defeat, were narrated in the play as having already occurred. We must rather infer from Strabo's statements that the prediction of his death was either mentioned by Calchas himself, or used against him to counteract the effect of his own prophecies².

The tradition ran that, after the capture of Troy, Calchas, who had accurate foreknowledge of the disaster impending for the Greek fleet, refused to return home, and, accompanied by Amphilochoi, the son of Amphiaraus, who was himself possessed of prophetic powers (Cic. de div. 1. 88, Pausan. 1. 34. 3), after a period of wandering, settled with his followers in Asia Minor. The details of the contest with Mopsus are variously recorded, but all accounts agree that Calchas died from chagrin at his defeat. The preponderance of authority names as the place where the two seers came into conflict the Ionian city of Colophon, which contained the precinct and oracular shrine of the Clarian Apollo: such was the version of the epic *Nosti*³, of Hesiod (fr. 188), and of Pherecydes (FHG 1. 94)⁴. A variant, recorded by Servius on Verg. Ecl. 6. 72 on the authority of Euphron, the Alexandrian poet, locates the contest at the shrine of the Grynean Apollo near Myrina in Aeolis. Herodotus, however, in agreement with Sophocles, preserves the tradition of

¹ In Nachtr. p. 293 he referred frs. 176 and 177 to the threatening speech of the Achaean envoy.

² Similarly Welcker, p. 123, and Wagner, Epit. Vat. p. 259. The story has been fully discussed by Immisch in Jhrb. f. Phil. Suppl. xvii 160.

³ The mention of Tiresias by Proclus is an error (EGF p. 53).

⁴ The two latter are quoted by Strabo 642: see also Apollod. epit. 6. 2-4, Lycophr. 424 ff., Conon 6.

a settlement in Pamphylia (7. 91 : so Pausan. 7. 3. 7, Quint. 14. 369). Callinus (ap. Strabo 668) endeavoured to reconcile the conflicting statements by the supposition that Calchas died at Claros, but that his followers in company with Mopsus crossed the Taurus, and either remained in Pamphylia or scattered in other directions. It would seem that these are the aetiological stories spread by rival sanctuaries, which attest the successive immigrations of Greek settlers.

The Argument to the Ajax (p. 3, ed. Jebb) mentions a play entitled 'Ελένης ἄρπαγή, as belonging, together with the Antenoridae, Aechmalotides, and Memnon, to the Τρωϊκὴ πραγματεία. On the assumption that this play is meant, Nauck suggested that it had been confused with the 'Ελένης ἄρπαγή of Alexis, the poet of the Middle Comedy (II 320 K.). On the other hand, Welcker (p. 158 ff.) had no hesitation in supposing that the subject was the recovery of Helen by Menelaus from the house of Deiphobus during the sack of Troy¹. Whether 'Helen's rape' was a loose mode of referring to 'Ελένης ἀπαίτησις is not easy to decide ; but, if a play so entitled had an independent existence, I cannot believe that it dealt with any other matter than the seizure of Helen by Paris². Ahrens and Wagner thought that the 'Ελένης ἄρπαγή described the conflict which arose at Troy after the return of Paris from Sparta, when Antenor and his party vainly advocated the surrender of Helen. But it is improbable that Sophocles wrote a second play so similar in its scope to the 'Ελένης ἀπαίτησις.

Hermann's view (Comm. soc. phil. Lips. I 247) that this was a satyr-play proceeded on the assumption that Aristides, in the passage quoted in the Introductory Note to the 'Ελένης γάμοι, was referring to the 'Ελένης ἀπαίτησις.

176

καὶ γὰρ χαρακτήρ αὐτὸς ἐν γλώσσῃ τί με παρηγορεῖ Δάκωνος ὁσμᾶσθαι λόγον.

176. 1 αὐτὴς T, τὸν A 2 παρηγορεῖ AMT | ὁρμᾶσθαι CT, ὁρμᾶσαι A,
ὁρᾶσθαι M | λόγῳ A

176 Schol. Eur. Phoen. 301 εἰ γὰρ τῆς φωνῆς. ὡς Σοφοκλῆς 'Ελένης ἀπαίτησει καὶ Ἑλληνικῶς ἐλάλουν (sc. αἱ Φοίνισσαι), 'καὶ γὰρ...λόγον.'
ἀλλ' οὖν γε τὴν πατριὸν ἐσφῆον ἀπήχησιν Nauck says 'locus nondum emendatus.'

¹ In Nachtr. p. 294 he made another guess, founded on the abstract of the Cypria (EGF p. 20), that, after the refusal of the Trojans to surrender Helen, Achilles desired to see her, and that Aphrodite conveyed her from the town to him by the exercise of her magic power, and at the request of Thetis.

² Cf. e.g. Hdt. 2. 118, and n. on Eur. Hel. 50.

and various attempts have been made to improve the text: (1) Herwerden, who formerly proposed δοφρέσθαι for δομάσθαι, now also with Gennadius restores αὐτόθεν γλώσσης in v. 1; (2) Hermann conjectured αὐτός, Gomperz τραυλός, Mekler ἀφατος, and Blaydes ἄλλος (with ὦν γλώσσης) for αὐτός. The words are not altogether clear, but are defensible, if ἐν γλώσση is taken after δομάσθαι: 'the very ring (of his words) persuades me to scent a trace of the Laconian speech in his talk.' For χαρακτήρ cf. Hdt. 1. 142 χαρακτήρες γλώσσης τέσσαρες, Ar. Pac. 220 ὁ γούνη χαρακτήρ ἡμεδαπῶς τῶν ῥημάτων, and for the metaphorical use of δομάσθαι Ar. Lys. 619 καὶ μάλιστα δοφραίνουμαι τῆς Ἰππίου τυραννίδος, Nuβ. 398 Κρονίων δζων. H. thinks that the choice of the word παρηγορεῖ was suggested by—and intended to suggest—κατηγορεῖ, which belongs to the vocabulary of the Physiognomists: see his n. on Aesch. Ag. 283. He adds that in Hom. Γ' 213 Antenor describes Menelaus' manner of speech on this occasion: ἦτοι μὲν Μενέλαος ἐπιτροχάδην ἀγδρευεν | παῦρα μὲν ἀλλὰ μάλα λιγέως, ἐπεὶ οὐ πολὺμυθος, | οὐδ' ἀφαιμαρτοεπής in contrast with Odysseus, whose words were like a shower of snow.

Tucker on Cho. 561 uses this passage in support of his view that differences of dialect were actually reproduced on the stage: see however on Phoen. 301.

R. Engelmann, Archäologische Studien, p. 17, infers that Helen or one of her attendants hears Menelaus speak, and recognizes him as a Laconian from his accent. See also Introductory Note.

177

γυναῖκα δ' ἐξέλοντες ἥ θράσσει γένυν τε ὡς τοῦ μὲν ἔωλον γραφίοις ἐνημμένοις.

177. 2 ἔωλον] ἔωλον C, αἰώλον F, αἰόλον O

177 Erotian gloss. Hippocr. p. 77, 3 θράσσει... ἔστι δὲ ἀχλεῖ. ὡς καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἑλένης ἀπαιτήσῃ φησὶ 'γυναῖκα... ἐνημμένοις'

1 M. Schmidt proposed γυναῖκα δὲ ζητούντες (or δ' ἐξαιτούντες), comparing Ar. fr. 451 I 507 K. γυναῖκα δὲ ζητούντες ἐνθάδ' ἤκομεν. For θράσσει cf. fr. 1055 (n.).

2 This corrupt passage has been emended in various ways, but the true reading appears to be beyond recall. (1) Hermann (praef. Eur. Hel. p. XIX): χρῶζοντο ἔωλον γραφίοις ἐνημμένην, μυλῆτε ποτὶτι, quae ringendo vexat marcidam genam penicillis incensam, i.e. rubentem ope penicillorum. But ἐνημμένη in the sense of inflamed is very harsh; the usual word would be ἐντετριμμένη. Welcker, agreeing generally, preferred to keep γρ. ἐνημμένοις, and held that ἔωλον must not be pressed too much. Hartung extracts the same sense but reads ἐγγράφοισιν αἵμασιν ('mit ange-maltem Blut'), comparing Ani. 528 αἱματόεν ῥέθος. Ahrens, following Hermann's explanation, thinks that the couplet came from Antenor's speech: 'shall we retain a woman like this?' (2) Nauck conjectures τρωτοῦ Μενέλεω γραφίοις ἐνημμένοις; Μενέλεω had previously been suggested by Bergk, and γραφίοις by J. G. Schneider. H. modified this proposal by reading τρέστον rather than τρωτοῦ (J. P. XXIII 272). For the 'craven' Menelaus see his note on Aesch. Ag. 125. Blaydes's τὴν τοῦ Μενέλεω γ' ἀπλῶς ἠρπασμένην is far from the original and weak in sense. Helen is described as threatening or attempting to burn out Menelaus' eyes with a lighted torch: H. compares Hygin. fab. 122 Electra uti auditur id, truncum ardentem ex ara sustulit, voluitque inscia sorori Iphigeniae oculos erueret. Prop. 3. 8. 7 tu minilare oculos subiecta exurere flamma! For the word γραφίον see Athen. 699e, where Seleucus is quoted as giving the following explanation: γραφίον ἐστὶν τὸ πρίονον ἢ δρέκον ξύλον, ὃ περιεθλασμένον καὶ κατεσχισμένον ἐξάπτεσθαι καὶ φαίνει τοῖς ὁδοιποροῦσιν. The phrase γραφίοις ἐνημμένοις has high probability, but the meaning given to the context is less attractive. Helen with a lighted torch recalls Verg. Aen. 6. 518 flammam media ipsa tenebat | ingentem, et summa Danaos ex arce vocabat; but it would not be easy to work that idea into the traditional text. (3) R. Ellis in C. R. ix 105 proposed δοτοῦν θ' ἔωλον γραφίοις ἐνερμέναις, as a description of a woman picking her teeth with a stylus.

178

ἐμοὶ δὲ λῶστον αἶμα ταύρειον πιεῖν
καὶ μὴ 'πὶ πλείον τῶνδ' ἔχειν δυσφημίας.

178. 1 ταύρειον πιεῖν Suid., Ar.: ταύρου γ' ἐκπιεῖν schol. Ar. 2 μὴ 'πὶ Wecklein olim: μήγε (μήτε Θ) codd., μὴ τι Dindorf, μὴ ἐτι Cobet | πλείον Θ: πλείω ceteri codd., πλείους Cobet

178 Schol. Ar. Eg. 84 ἔστι γούρ ἀπὸ Σοφοκλέους Ἑλένης 'ἐμοὶ...δυσφημίας.' τινὲς δὲ φασιν ὅτι Σοφοκλῆς περὶ Θεμιστοκλέους τοῦτο φησι. ψεύδονται δέ· οὐ γάρ ἐστι πιθανόν. Suid. s.v. νῶν: (after quoting the text of Aristophanes) περὶ Θεμιστοκλέους οὖν Σοφοκλῆς φησὶν 'ἐμοὶ...πιεῖν.' The words of Aristophanes (Eg. 83 f.) are βέλτιστον ἡμῖν αἶμα ταύρειον πιεῖν. | ὁ Θεμιστοκλέους γὰρ θάνατος αἰρετώτερος, and the authority followed by Suidas simply drew an inference from the text of Aristophanes. The origin of the story about Themistocles has now been traced to the misinterpretation of a statue in the market-place of Magnesia: see P. Gardner in Corolla Numismatica (in honour of Barclay V. Head) at p. 109, and in C. R. XII 21 ff.

Nauck prints this fragment among those of doubtful origin, although he admits that it seems to belong to the 'Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησις. But Dindorf is justified in definitely assigning it to this play: the evidence is quite as good as we have in most cases, and the words are entirely suitable to Helen's position. The play 'Ἑλένης γάμοι is out of the question.

1 αἶμα ταύρειον. For the belief that bull's blood was poisonous, and the possible explanations of its origin see Neil on Ar. I. c., Frazer's Pausanias, IV p. 175, and Gruppe, p. 877n. According to one version of the story, Aeson the father of Jason was driven by Pelias to suffer death in this way (Apollod. I. 143, Diod. 4. 50). H. Johnson in C. R. XXV

171 suggests that αἶμα ταύρου = menstrua, on the strength of ταύρου· τὸ γυναικείον αἰδοῖον Phot.

2 γε (see cr. n.) would be impossible in this context, and, although πλείω might be adverbial (J. quotes Plat. Phileb. 45 C εἰ πλείω χαίρουσιν οἱ σφόδρα νοσούντες τῶν ὑγιαίνοντων, τερ. 417 B πολὺ πλείω καὶ μᾶλλον δειδότες τοὺς ἐνδον ἢ τοὺς ἐξωθεν πολεμίου), the combination of τι πλείω is hardly to be tolerated. Blaydes recommends καὶ μὴ 'τι πλείω...δυσφημίας. I prefer to read ἐπὶ πλείον in the sense of apud more, making τῶνδ' masculine with probable reference to the Trojans. O. C. 1777 μὴδ' ἐπὶ πλείω θρήνον ἐγείρετε is now explained as a case of tmesis: no doubt rightly, unless there too we should read πλείον. [This correction has been anticipated by Wecklein, who suggested 'πὶ πλείον τάσδ' (or τήνδ'...δυσφημίας), but finally preferred 'πὶ πλείω χρόνον on the ground that πλείον is not tragic (cf. fr. 774 and Aesch. Pers. 793). H., who had arrived at the same conclusion, points out that ἐπὶ πλείον is frequent in Thucydides, e.g. 1. 65 ὅπως ἐπὶ πλείον ὁ σίτος ἀντίσχη 'may hold out longer'; so Hdt. 2. 171, 5. 21.] Cobet (Coll. Crit. p. 200) well remarks: 'δυσφημίας ἔχειν dicitur sensu passivo, ut αἰτῶν ἔχειν, ὄνομα, ἔπαινον, ψόγον ἔχειν, et similia his alia complura.' For the ambiguity of such expressions contrast μέμψιν ἔχειν in Eur. Hclid. 974 with μομφάν ἔχων in Soph. At. 180, and see the comm. on Pind. Isth. 3. 54.

179

ἀναχαιτίζει

179 Hesych. I p. 186 ἀναχαιτίζειν· ἀπειθεῖν. ἀναχαλινούειν, ἀνακρούεται· ἀναποδίζει. κυρίως δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν ἱππῶν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἑλένης ἀπαίτησιν. It seems clear that the lemma has dropped out before ἀνακρούεται, i.e. ἀναχαιτίζει: cf.

Bekk. anecd. p. 393. 20 ἀναχαιτίζει· ἀναποδίζει, ἐκκόπτει (l. ἐγκόπτει). Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 124, 28 ἀναχαιτίζει· ἀναποδίζει, ἀνακόπτει. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἀπειθεῖ καὶ ἀντιτείνει. Suid. ἀναχαιτίζει. ἀναποδίζει, ἐγκόπτει. ἀναχαιτίζειν Σοφοκλῆς τὸ ἀπειθεῖν καὶ ἀντιτείνειν. The evidence of Photius and Suidas leads to the conclusion that Sophocles used ἀναχατίζειν in the sense of ἀπειθεῖν, and that there is some confusion in the order of the words as given by Hesychius. The words κυρίως...ἐπικω (cf. Dion. H. ant. Rom. 5. 15 οἱ ἔπικοι...ἐπὶ τοῖς ὀπισθεῖς ἀνίστανται πρὸς καὶ τοὺς ἐπιβάτας ἀναχατίζαντες ἀποσείονται) indicate that Soph. recognized the metaphorical sense of which there is a good example in Plut. Demetr. 34 ὡς μὴ πάλιν ἀναχατίζαντα τὸν δῆμον ἀσχολίας...παρασχεῖν. Cf. Ant. 291 κρυφῇ κἀρα σείοντες, οὐδ' ὑπὸ ζυγῶ | λόφον δικαίως εἶχον. The explanations ἀναποδίζειν and ἐγκόπτει no doubt refer to the usage found in Lucian Lexiph. 15 ἀναχατίζοι τοῦ δρόμου τὸ ῥόδιον, of checking the way of a boat. In late Greek ἀναχατίζειν is often the equivalent of refrenare (Phryn. praepr. soph. p. 32, 8 de B.).

180

[τὸν θάνατον τοῦ Κάλχαντος εἰς Παμφυλίαν μεταφέρει]

180 Strabo 643 οἱ δὲ τὸν Κάλχαντα φασὶν ἀποθανεῖν ὑπὸ λύπης καὶ κατὰ τι λόγον. λέγει δ' αὐτὸ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἑλένης ἀπαιτήσῃ, ὡς εἰμαρμένον εἴη ἀποθανεῖν, θῆαν κρείττονι ἑαυτοῦ μάντι περιτύχη. οὗτος δὲ καὶ εἰς Κιλικίαν μεταφέρει τὴν ἔριν (scil. of Calchas and Mopsus) καὶ τὸν θάνατον τοῦ Κάλχαντος. Cf. ibid. 675 ἤρισαν περὶ τῆς μαντικῆς ὃ τε Κάλχας καὶ ὁ Μόψος· ταύτην τε γὰρ τὴν ἔριν μεταφέρουσιν ἔνιοι, καθάπερ καὶ Σοφοκλῆς, εἰς τὴν Κιλικίαν, καλέσας ἐκείνους αὐτὴν Παμφυλίαν τραγικῶς, καθάπερ καὶ τὴν Λυκίαν Καρίαν καὶ τὴν Τροίαν καὶ Λυδίαν Φρυγίαν. καὶ τὸν θάνατον δὲ τοῦ Κάλχαντος ἐνταῦθα παραδίδασιν ἄλλοι τε καὶ Σοφοκλῆς.

The various versions of the story relating to the death of Calchas have already been discussed in the Introductory Note. We learn that the distinctive point introduced by Sophocles was the change of scene for the prophetic contest from Claros to Cilicia. On the other hand, in schol. Dionys. Perieg. 850 (GGM II 454) Mopsus leads the emigration to Cilicia after the death of Calchas. According to Hesiod (fr. 188 Rz.) Calchas propounded to Mopsus for his solution the question how many figs were growing on a certain tree, and his calculation of the number proved to be absolutely correct. Pherecydes (FHG I 95) reported the problem as concerning the size of the litter of a pregnant sow. Other accounts (see Strabo 643) mentioned both problems, stating that Calchas propounded the latter to Mopsus, and that it was answered correctly; but that, when Mopsus submitted the former to him, Calchas failed in his reply, and died of grief, as the oracle had foretold. Further variations on the same theme will be found in schol. Lycophr. 427 and 980; but it is impossible to trace the particular version adopted by Sophocles. Pausanias (7. 3. 7) states that the Pamphylians were of Greek origin, being descended from the companions of Calchas who arrived there in that country after the fall of Troy. For the geographical laxity, by which Pamphylia and Cilicia are confused or identified, we may perhaps compare Aesch. Supp. 560 (530) καὶ δὲ ὄρων Κιλικίαν Παμφύλων τε διορνεμένα, with Tucker's note. For the common identification of the Trojans with the Phrygians see Jebb on At. 1054.

ΕΛΕΝΗΣ ΓΑΜΟΣ ΣΑΤΥΡΙΚΟΣ

The character of the play is clearly illustrated by Aristid. II p. 399 Dind., where he is speaking of hypocritical rhetoricians. εἰ δὲ τις αὐτῶν περὶ τῆς ἐγκρατείας διαλεγόμενων ἀπαντικρὺ σταίη ἔχων ἐνθρυπτα καὶ στρεπτούς, ἐκβάλλουσι τὴν γλῶτταν ὥσπερ ὁ Μενέλεως τὸ ξίφος (alluding to Eur. Andr. 629: cf. schol. Ar. Lys. 155). αὐτὴν μὲν γὰρ εἰάν ἴδωσι τὴν Ἑλένην, — Ἑλένην λέγω; θεράπαιναν μὲν οὖν ὅποιαν ἐποίησε Μένανδρος τὴν Φρυγίαν, τῷ ὄντι παιδιὰν ἀποφαίνουσι τοὺς σατύρους τοῦ Σοφοκλέους. The satyrs, then, were excited with passionate desire at the sight of Helen's beauty.

According to the version of the Cypria (EGF p. 18), after landing at Sidon (Hom. Z 290) and taking the city, Alexander at length sailed to Troy, where he completed the celebration of his nuptials¹. But, as Welcker remarks, the scene of the satyr-play was much less likely to be at Troy than before a shady cave or near a babbling brook. I should conjecture, therefore, that the action of the play took place at Cranae, of which Homer speaks as the first resting-place of the lovers:

ὅτε σε πρῶτον Λακεδαίμονος ἔξ ἐρατεινῆς ἐπλεον ἀρπάξας ἐν ποντοπόροις νέεσσιν, νῆσφ δ' ἐν Κρανάῃ ἐμίγην φιλότῃ καὶ εὐνῇ (Γ 443 ff.).

Pausan. 3. 22. 1 identifies Cranae with a small island off Gythium in the Laconian gulf; but Strabo 399 and Lycophr. 110 understand Homer as speaking of Helena, the rocky island stretching along the E. coast of Attica (Eur. Hel. 1673 n.).

Welcker suggests that the dance σκοπός (τῶν ἀποσκοπούντων τι σχῆμα) was suitable to the occasion: see Aesch. frs. 79, 339.

181

πέπων ἐρινὸς . . . ἀχρεῖος ὦν
ἐς βρώσιν ἄλλους ἐξερινάζεις λόγῳ.

181 Athen. 76 c, speaking of ἐρινὰ σῦκα, figs of an inferior quality, says that Sophocles in a metaphor applied ἐρινός, properly the tree's name, to the fruit: Σοφοκλῆς δ' ἐν Ἑλένης γάμῳ τροπικῶς τῷ τοῦ δένδρου ὀνόματι τὸν καρπὸν ἐκάλεσεν, εἰπὼν 'πέπων...λόγῳ.' πέπων δ' ἐρινὸς εἶρηκεν ἀπὸ τοῦ πέπον ἐρινόν. Alexis, he goes on to say, speaks of the fig-sellers putting τὰ σκληρὰ καὶ μοχθηρὰ τῶν σῦκων at the bottom of the basket, and ripe and fine ones on the top, and so ἐρίν' ἀπέδοτο, σῦκα πωλεῖν ὀμνῶν (fr. 128, II 343 K.). Eustath. II. p. 1205, 3, quoting avowedly from Athenaeus, says: ὅτι ἐκεῖθεν καὶ ῥῆμα ἐρινάζειν παρὰ Σοφοκλεί, ἐνθα τὸν καρπὸν τῷ τοῦ δένδρου ἐκάλεσεν ὀνόματι, εἰπὼν 'πέπων...λόγῳ.' παροιμιακὸν δὲ αὐτὸ [qu. αὐτοῦ] τὸ νῆμα, ὁμοίον τῷ

'ἀπαίδευτος ὦν πῶς ἂν ἐτέροις παιδεύσεαι;' 'Being uninstructed, how can you instruct others?' He took it therefore to mean 'Since you are yourself worthless, those instructed by your conversation turn out worthless too.'

The explanation of Eustathius is accepted by Brunck, Schweighäuser and Ellendt; and Meineke's version (Theocr. p. VII) is practically to the same effect: 'tu ignavae et inutilis caprifici instar aliis ut item ignavos et inutiles se praestent oratione persuades.' He omitted ἀχρεῖος ὦν ἐς βρώσιν as an interpolation. On the other hand, Casaubon renders: 'tu cum sis grossus nihili et insipidus, ad comedendum inutilis, alios verbis increpas, tanquam ignavos et insipidos'; and this is also the view of Cobet (V. L. p. 289),

¹ See n. on fr. 183.

who, deleting ἀχρεῖος, explains by the paraphrase φαῦλος ὢν ἄλλους ἐκφραλίσεις, 'worthless yourself, you make out others to be worthless, speak disparagingly of others.'

H., however, shows that the true meaning has been perceived by Stephanus alone of previous writers: 'nam ὁ ἐρινὸς quod ipse non habet, aliis tribuit, i.e. jungeris vice colitis, exsors ipse secandi, you fertilize others by precept like some Nestor: see Isocrates ap. Plut. mor. 838 κ. Similar is a proverbial line of an old man marrying (Paroeni. I p. 390) γέρον ἐρινὸς εὐφρανεῖς τοῖς γέροντας, i.e. αὐτὸς ἀχρεῖος ὢν, ἄλλους ὠφελήσεις. For wild figs were proverbially useless (hence Spohn restored ἐρινὸς in Theocr. 13. 50 for the ἐρινὸς or ἐρεινὸς of the mss). But, though useless in themselves, they were useful for impregnating the cultivated: see the Dictt. s.vv. ἐρινάω, φηληκόρεπτος, or Stein on Hdt. 1. 193. The proverb ἀνερίναστος εἶ in Zenob. 2. 23 is differently explained.

The reading in the first line is either defective or interpolated. Porson, holding the former view, conjectured πέπων ἐρινὸς <ὡς> ἀχρεῖος <αὐτὸς> ὢν. Casaubon's αὐτὸς ὢν ἀχρήσιος is impossible. Scaliger inserted παντελῶς after ἐρινὸς as a stop-gap. On the other hand, Cobet ejected ἀχρεῖος as a gloss, and Meineke, as we have seen, suspected the whole phrase ἀχρεῖος ὢν ἐς βρώσιν. So far as the language goes, neither ἀχρεῖος nor βρώσις is open to suspicion in tragedy, and ἐς is quite normal.

182

νένωται

182 Etym. M. p. 601, 23 νένωται (so FMV: νένωται vulg.) ἥ κατὰ συγκοπήν τοῦ ἡ ἀπὸ τοῦ νενόηται... ἡ ἀπὸ τοῦ νένωται κατὰ συστολήν. ἔστι γὰρ νῶ ῥῆμα τρίτης συζυγίας ὡς (καὶ F, which Nauck prefers) παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ, αὐτὸν Ἑλένης γάμῳ νένωται. Hesych. 111 p. 148 νένωται· ἐν νῶ ἔχει.

Cf. Anacreon fr. 10 ὁ δ' ὑψηλὰ νενωμένος. Lobeck (Path. El. 11 p. 114) hesitated whether νένωμαι or νένωμαι should be written in Sophocles and Anacreon; but, as Nauck says, νένωμαι is an incredible form. For the Ionic contraction of ση to ω see Weir Smyth's Ionic Dialect, pp. 190, 267. In the verbs it is limited to βοάω and νοέω. There is no other certain example of this contraction in tragedy, but Dindorf read κάπιβῶ for κάπιβῶα in Aesch. Pers. 1055. See also Jebb on El. 882.

183

ὁροσάγγαι

183 Claudius Casilo παρὰ τοῖς Ἀττικοῖς ῥήτοσι ζητούμενα in Miller's Mélanges de litt. gr. p. 397: ὁροσάγγαι μὲν οἱ σεματοφύλακες, ὡς Σοφοκλῆς Ἑλένης <ς> γάμῳ καὶ Τρωίῳ (fr. 634). The same appears in Phot. lex. appendix p. 674, 21, with the omission of Σοφοκλῆς.

Sophocles does not appear to have used the name correctly, as according to Hdt. 8. 85 it was the title given to the King's benefactors: cf. fr. 125. Priam appears in tragedy as an oriental despot (Aesch. Ag. 926), and the customs at his court are those of the later Persian empire

(Eur. Tro. 1021). See Dissen on Pind. Pyth. 11. 33. H. inferred from this fragment that the scene of the play was at Troy, and that the wedding of Helen to Paris was celebrated after her arrival there. He quoted Proclus's epitome of the Cypria (p. 18 Kinkel): καὶ προσερχθεῖς Σιδῶνι δ' Ἀλέξανδρος αἰρεῖ τὴν πόλιν· καὶ ἀποπλεύσας εἰς Ἴλιον γάμους τῆς Ἑλένης ἐπετέλεσεν. Aesch. Ag. 707 τὸ νυμφότιμον μέλος ἐκφάτως πίνοντας, | ὑμέραιον, ὅς τόν ἐπέρρεπεν | γαμβροῖσιν αἰδεῖν. See, however, Introductory Note.

184

πανόν

184 Phot. lex. p. 377, 22 πανόν· ἀπὸ τοῦ πάντα φαίνειν σχηματισθέντα (σχηματισθέν Naber), κατὰ μεταβολὴν τοῦ φ. Σοφοκλῆς Ἑλένης γάμῳ. The same derivation is given by Eustath. Il. p. 1189, 24 πανός ἀπὸ τοῦ φαίνειν σχημα-τισθείς, φασί, κατὰ μεταβολὴν τοῦ φ, οἶον 'πανούχον ἄξαντες φλόγα.' (Tr. fr. adesp. 160.) Meineke corrected ἄξαντες to ἄψαντες, but was scarcely justified in his conclusion that Eustathius and Photius were referring to the same passage of Sophocles.

ΕΠΙΓΟΝΟΙ

ΕΡΙΦΥΛΗ

The Epigoni of Sophocles was one of his most famous plays; and there is consequently a presumption that, when the title Epigoni alone is quoted without the name of an author, the play of Sophocles and not that of Aeschylus is meant. The inference may be strengthened by the following considerations. It was customary in the fourth century, when the tragic art was declining, and the age of the actors had succeeded to the age of the poets, to reproduce the plays of the famous dramatists of the earlier period; but it is well known that the practice was for the most part confined to the plays of Sophocles and Euripides, whereas those of Aeschylus were considered too old-fashioned and obscure for the purpose (Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 99). Hence, when we read of the actor Andronicus, with whom Demosthenes studied elocution, having scored a success in the Epigoni (Athen. 584 D), we are justified in concluding that the line quoted from that play

δόλομνε παίδων, ποῖον εἰρηκας λόγον; (Tr. fr. adesp. 2)

belongs to Sophocles. We arrive at the same result from Cic. de opt. gen. orat. 18 idem Andriam et Synephebos nec minus Terentium et Caecilium quam Menandrum legunt, nec Andromacham aut Antiopam aut Epigonos Latinos reiciunt: immo Ennium et Pacuvium et Accium potius quam Euripidem et Sophoclem legunt. Since we know that the Andromache of Euripides was adapted by Ennius, and the Antiope by Pacuvius, the inference is almost inevitable that the Epigoni of Sophocles was adapted by Accius. Similarly, when Cicero (Tusc. 2. 60) reports: Cleanthem (1 607 Arn., p. 328 P.), cum pede terram percussisset, versum ex Epigonis ferunt dixisse, 'audisne haec, Amphiarae, sub terram abdite?' (Tr. fr. adesp. 3), we understand at once that the reference is to the Epigoni of Sophocles¹.

¹ Wilamowitz, de tragicorum Graecorum fragmentis, Göttingen 1893, p. 26, argues briefly to the same effect.

The direct evidence bearing on the plot of the Epigoni, scanty as it is, is sufficient to show that the central incident was the murder of Eriphyle, followed by the first beginnings of Alcmaeon's madness. All the authorities lay stress on the command given to his sons by Amphiaras, when forced by Eriphyle's treachery to join the expedition of the Seven, that when grown to manhood they should exact retribution from their mother: see Apollod. 3. 62, Diod. 4. 66, Hygin. fab. 73. But Asclepiades¹ (Schol. V Hom. λ 326, FHG III 305) reports this in the form that Alcmaeon was forbidden to join the expedition of the Epigoni until he had put his mother to death; and Alcmaeon was said to have fulfilled the behest. Apollodorus, on the other hand (3. 86), makes the death of Eriphyle subsequent to the return of the Epigoni, stating that Alcmaeon was moved by the discovery of his mother's second act of treachery in accepting the peplos from Thersander, the son of Polynices, as a bribe for persuading her sons to join the expedition, and was also instigated by the oracular command of Apollo. From these facts Bethe inferred the existence of two epic versions in the Epigoni and the Alcmaeonis; in the former the murder occurred after, and in the latter before the expedition (Theb. Heldenlieder, pp. 129, 130 ff., 135 ff.: see also Gruppe, p. 537). Welcker (p. 272) had no hesitation in holding that in Sophocles the murder of Eriphyle preceded the expedition of the Epigoni; and treated the account of Apollodorus, which he regarded as damaging to the character of Alcmaeon, as the work of some later tragedian. This is as may be; but it would be idle to suppose that, if we see reason to place the expedition before the matricide, we are thereby compelled to accept all the details in Apollodorus. Indeed, his story (3. 81) is intrinsically absurd and dramatically impossible. If Alcmaeon was already convinced of the binding force of his father's command, how could he possibly postpone its execution to await the doubtful issue of the siege? 'If I return safe, I will kill my mother'! And was Eriphyle so favourably placed as to be worth bribing? What inducements had she to offer which could have the slightest effect upon a determined enemy? Or, if she could persuade him to spare her life—if only for a season—surely she needed no bribe to make her undertake the task. The whole account is nonsense, unless we suppose that Alcmaeon was *not yet aware of his father's command*². On the other hand, Welcker's view has to meet the difficulty that, if the Erinyes assailed Alcmaeon at once, he must have become incapable of taking the supreme command. After the death of Eriphyle his first object would have been to procure expiation; and, if any weight may be given to the fragments of Accius' Epigoni, it appears that after the matricide Alcmaeon sought to appease the offended powers by lustration and sacrifice: see fr. IX apud abundantem antiquam amnem et rapidas undas Inachi, X nunc pergam ut suppliciiis placans caelitem aras expleam. Since the Argives are described as eager for war (fr. III), it might be thought that the siege and capture of Thebes took place during the course of the play—a possibility not lightly to be rejected, for which the Supplices of Euripides provides an adequate parallel. Nevertheless, Ahrens and Ribbeck (p. 496) agree with Welcker as to the time of Eriphyle's murder, and the latter suggests that the Furies postponed the execution of their vengeance until their victim should have finished his appointed task. We do not elsewhere find them so obliging¹. Immisch (Jahrb. Philol. Suppl. XVII 180 ff.), who takes the same view, is not justified in supporting it by postea as used by Hygin. fab. 73 (Alcmaeon memor patris praecepti Eriphylen matrem suam interfecit. quem postea furiae exagitarunt). Equally unconvincing is his suggestion that Alcmaeon was healed of his madness by Apollo forthwith, but that it subsequently broke out afresh.

¹ The work of Asclepiades bore the title τραγῳδοῦμενα, and it might seem natural to ascribe his version to Sophocles without more ado. But the character of his book does not warrant the inference that he abstracted existing plays: see Wenzel in Pauly-Wissowa II 1628.

² Immisch, however, contends that Apollodorus followed the Alcmaeon of Euripides, and finds in fr. 70 a trace of the discussion between Eriphyle and her son.

It is highly probable that a dialogue between Alcmaeon and Adrastus, the brother of Eriphyle, took place after the catastrophe, and that the incipient signs of frenzy showed themselves at this point. Since it has been shown that the Epigoni of Sophocles was the best-known tragedy dealing with the story of Alcmaeon and Eriphyle, a peculiar significance attaches to the inclusion of Alcmaeon by Antiphanes (fr. 191, II 90 K.) in a list of famous stage-characters:

ἀν πάλιν
εἶπε τις Ἀλκμέωνα, καὶ τὰ παῖδιά πάντ' εὐθὺς εἶρηχ' ὅτι μανεῖς ἀπέκτονε τὴν μητέρ', ἀγανακτῶν δ' Ἀδραστος εὐθέως ἤξει πάλιν τ' ἄπεισι.

There is therefore good reason for following Ribbeck in assigning Tr. fr. adesp. 358 to this play: see p. 69.

¹ If it were legitimate to use Accius in reconstructing Sophocles—and in this case Cicero's statement lends some justification to the attempt—there are several fragments which might be significant, particularly those relating to the appearance of Amphilochoi (fr. IV: cf. Apollod. 3. 86, Pausan. 1. 34. 3) and Demonassa (fr. IX: cf. Pausan. 3. 15. 8, 9. 5. 15). By a brilliant conjecture in fr. XVI Bergk introduced a reference to Glisas, the scene of the decisive battle fought between the Epigoni and the Thebans (Pausan. 9. 9. 4).

A difficult and important question remains: was Welcker right in identifying the titles Epigoni and Eriphyle? Or, in other words, is this a case where the name of a leading character—for we cannot say that Eriphyle was more important than Alcmaeon—has been substituted for the original title? A prima facie case may be made in favour of separation: there are seven unambiguous references to the Eriphyle; there is no evidence of an alternative title; and the familiarity of the title Epigoni would have been against its displacement. On the other hand, there is much force in Welcker's contention that the tragic death of Eriphyle must have been described in the tragedy which bears her name, and there are several undisputed examples of a mistake arising in the course of the tradition through the substitution for the title of a name taken from the text¹. On the general question see Introduction, § 1; but this is not a case of isolated error. Rather we should have to suppose that the double title was introduced originally by the grammarians to distinguish the play of Sophocles from the less familiar and differently constructed work of Aeschylus; and that subsequently the anthologists cited only one of the two titles². Fr. 198 might seem to be decisive in Welcker's favour, but, as it is not quoted from the *Eriphyle*³, there is no reason why, if the occasion required, it should not be transferred to the Epigoni. Therefore we can only say that no other solution of the difficulty seems so probable as Welcker's; and his identification has been accordingly accepted in this edition. Jacobs preferred to suppose that the Eriphyle related to the earlier expedition of the Seven, that it comprised the quarrel of Amphiaraus and Adrastus and the intervention of Polynices, and that the death of Amphiaraus (cf. fr. 958) was described at the end of the play. This theory cannot be disproved; but is it likely that such a play would have been entitled Eriphyle?

There is an obscure reference to the play in Philodem. de mus. p. 87 τὸ δ' ἐκ τῶν Ἐπιγόνων μέλος (ὑπογράφουσι οὐκ ἀπιθανωτέραν ἄλλην διάνοιαν, ἀλλ' ἐῷμεν ὡς οὗτος εἶα μετὰ τῆς ἐπισημασίας τοῦ κωμικογράφου) μυθικόν ἐστιν. Cf. ibid. p. 18 Πινδάρῳ γε γραφέν (γ' ἐγράφετο Usener) 'τὸ κοινόν τις ἀστῶν ἐν εὐδία τιθεῖς,' καὶ τὸ Σοφοκλέους ἐν τοῖς Ἐπιγόνους... The context shows that the opponent against whom Philodemus was arguing brought forward certain instances in which music exercised a soothing influence. The object therefore of the ode in the Epigoni was to compose the strife which had arisen between certain of the characters, and probably, as Immisch has pointed out (Philol. XLVIII 554), the reference is to the altercation between Alcmaeon and Adrastus after the matricide.

¹ The problem is none the less puzzling, when we find the titles Epigoni and Eriphyle also ascribed to Accius. Ribbeck (p. 489) takes the same view as Welcker.

² See Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 399.

³ This point is overlooked by Bethe in Pauly-Wissowa vi 462.

185

ὀλόμενε παίδων, ποῖον εἴρηκας λόγον;

185 Athen. 584 D 'Ανδρονίκου δὲ τοῦ τραγικοῦ ἀπ' ἀγῶνός τινος, ἐν ᾧ τοὺς Ἐπιγόνους (τοῖς Ἐπιγόνους Dobree, ὑποκρινόμενος add. Meineke) εὐημερῆκει, πίνειν μέλλοντος παρ' αὐτῇ (sc. Γναθαίᾳ) καὶ τοῦ παιδὸς κελεύοντος τὴν Γναθαίαν προαναλῶσαι, 'ὀλόμενε παίδων' ἔφη 'ποῖον εἴρηκας λόγον.'

The reasons for attributing this fragment (fr. adesp. 2 N.) to Sophocles have been given in the Introductory Note.

ὀλόμενε, accursed, wretched, corresponding to ὄλοιο, is used adjectivally, in the same way as the epic οὐλόμενος. It is an inversion of the historical development to suggest, as some have done, that the participle bore an active meaning. The usage does not recur in Sophocles (subject to a possible reservation in regard to Ant. 840), but is found in Aesch. Prom. 413, Suppl. 855, and several times in Euripides: cf. Hel. 232, 385, Phoen. 1029, Or. 1364, Med. 1253, Her. 1061 (Wilamowitz). —For the partitive genitive παίδων see on Eur. Hclid. 567.

186

[audisne haec, Amphiaræ, sub terram abdite?]

186 Cic. Tusc. 2. 60 Cleanthem (1607 Arn.), cum pede terram percussisset, versum ex Epigonis ferunt dixisse, 'audisne haec, Amphiaræ, sub terram abdite?'

Here also the authorship of Sophocles is generally admitted; see Nauck, p. 837. Nauck suggests that the original was κλύεις τὰδ', Ἀμφιάραε, γῆς κεύθων κάτω; (after O. T. 968, but κρυφθεῖς is just as likely). The chthonic cult of Amphiarus, especially at Oropus (Frazer, Pausan. II 466 ff.), was well-known. Cf. El. 836 ff. οἶδα γὰρ ἀνακτ' Ἀμφιάρεων χρυσοδέτοις | ἔρκεσι κρυφθέντα γυναικῶν· καὶ νῦν ὑπὸ γαῖας...πάμφυχος ἀνάσσει (with Jebb's nn.). Observe that the appeal to a chthonic power is illustrated by the fact that Cleanthes struck the ground with his foot: see e.g. Tucker on Aesch. Cho. 314, Headlam in C. R. XVI 53.

187

ΑΛΚΜ. ἀνδροκτόνου γυναικὸς ὁμογενῆς ἔφυς.

ΑΔΡ. σὺ δ' αὐτόχειρ γε μητρὸς ἧ σ' ἐγένεατο.

187 Plut. de aud. poet. 13 p. 35 E ὁ τραγικός Ἀδραστος τοῦ Ἀλκμέωνος εἰπόντος πρὸς αὐτὸν 'ἀνδροκτόνου...ἔφυς' ἀπεκρίνατο 'σὺ δ'...ἐγένεατο.' Plut. de utilit. ex inim. percip. 5 p. 88 F 'ἀνδροκτόνου...ἔφυς' πρὸς τὸν Ἀδραστον ὁ Ἀλκμέων· τί οὖν κείνους; οὐκ ἀλλότριον ἀλλ' ἴδιον αὐτῷ προσφύρον ὄνειδος, 'σὺ δ'...ἐγένεατο.' For the attribution of this fr.

to the Epigoni see Introductory Note.

1 ἀνδροκτόνου, husband-slaying: cf. Pind. Pyth. 4. 252 Λαμνίαν τ' ἐθνεῖ γυναικῶν ἀνδροκτόνων.

2 αὐτόχειρ, in reference to μητρὸς: see Jebb on Ant. 55.—μητρὸς ἧ σ' ἐγένεατο, El. 261: cf. At. 1172 πατρὸς δὲ σ' ἐγένεατο, Eur. Or. 29, El. 964, Aesch. fr. 175.

188

φιλεῖ γὰρ ἡ δύσκλεια τοῖς φθονομένοις
νικᾶν ἐπ' αἰσχροῖς ἢ πὶ τοῖς καλοῖς πλέον.

188. 2 ἡ πο (sic) Δ, ἡ πι γρ. A²

188 Stob. flor. 38. 27 (III p. 713, 11 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἐπίγονοι (so M: τοῦ αὐτοῦ ἐπίγονοι A, S omits the name of the play). 'φιλεῖ...πλέον.'

This difficult fragment awaits elucidation. Campbell, who remarks that the words are unmeaning in the absence of their context, adds that the general sense seems to be represented by 'He who acts honestly is better able to live down calumny.' This may well be the right track; for envy is said to be powerless against a good man: Eur. fr. 814 φθόνον οὐ σέβω, | φθονεῖσθαι δὲ θέλωμ' ἂν ἐπ' ἐσθλοῖς, Democrit. fr. 48 Diels μωμεομένων φλαυρῶν ὁ ἀγαθὸς οὐ ποιεῖται λόγον. The meaning of our passage will then be the same as that of an anonymous writer quoted by Stob. flor. 38. 39 φθόνος ὁ κατὰ τῶν εὐδοκιμούντων ἐπὶ τοῖς καλλίστοις ἀργῶν καὶ ἀπρακτῶν τῶν δὲ ἀγαθῶν καὶ οἷων τε τεκένει τι παρ' ἐωστών χρηστὸν οὐχ ἄπτεται. 'When men are attacked by envy, disgrace is wont to prevail, if their deeds are evil and not good.' τοῖς φθονομένοις is thus the dative of the person interested, and with νικᾶν used absolutely does not differ essentially from the dativus iudicantis (of mental interest only) in Ar. Av. 445 πᾶσι νικᾶν τοῖς κριταῖς | καὶ τοῖς θεαταῖς πᾶσιν. Tucker wished to substitute νικεῖν for νικᾶν and Wecklein δόσσοια for δύσκλεια, but in either case the interpretation of the lines is hardly less obscure, and in the former there is the additional objection that νικεῖν does not occur in tragedy. Blaydes proposed ἤκειν for νικᾶν.—For the omission of the article with αἰσχροῖς, which has the effect of emphasising καλοῖς by way of contrast, cf. Eur. Phoen. 495 ἀλλὰ καὶ σοφοῖς | καὶ τοῖσι φαύλοισι ἐνδοχ', ὡς ἐμοὶ δοκεῖ (n.), id. 1258 νίκης τε σῆμα καὶ τὸ τῶν ἡσσωμένων, El. 1351 οἷσιν δ' ὅσιον καὶ τὸ δίκαιον φίλον ἐν βίῳ. See also on fr. 149, 9.

189

ὦ πᾶν σὺν τολμήσασα καὶ πέρα γυνή, κάκιον ἄλλ' οὐκ ἔστιν οὐδ' ἔσται ποτὲ γυναικός, εἴ τι πῆμα γίγνεται βροτοῖς.

189. 1 γυνή MA: γύναι S

3 ἡ εἰ (ἦει M) τι codd.

189 Stob. flor. 73. 51 (IV p. 557, 7 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἐπίγονοι (ἐπίγονοι om. S) 'ὦ πᾶν...βροτοῖς.'

1 I think that Campbell was right in preferring γυνή to γύναι (see cr. n.), but I do not print a comma after πέρα as he does. The nom. is used because the words are an exclamation rather than an address: cf. Hom. A. 231 δημοβόρος βασιλεῖς, ἐπεὶ οὐτιδανοῖσιν ἀνάσσει, and see Monro H. G.² § 163.—καὶ πέρα is a frigid hyperbole, but is perhaps excusable on the ground that ὦ πᾶν σὺν τολμήσασα is virtually identical with ὦ πάντολμος, 'O thou who hast been wicked beyond all measure.' For the connotation of πάντολμος, a very strong word, see Headlam on Aesch. Ag. 128. There is a similar but less patent hyperbole in Eur. El. 1187 ἅλαστα μέλεα καὶ πέρα | παθοῦσα σὼν τέκνων ὑπαί. So Jebb takes O. C. 1745 τοτὲ μὲν ἀπορα, τοτὲ δ' ὑπερθεν. For πᾶν τολμᾶν cf. fr. 567 n. The words have not unnaturally been suspected: (1) Meineke conjectured γυνῆς, treating vv. 2 and 3 as a separate fragment; (2) Nauck required something like ὦ δεινὰ τολμήσασα καὶ δεινῶν πέρα (cf. Dem. 45. 73, Ar. Av. 416, Thesm. 705); (3) Stadtmueller proposed πέρα λόγου. But the text is probably sound.

3 εἴ τι κτέ., 'among all the sorrows that are men's.' πῆμα logically belongs to the principal clause, but is attracted to the protasis. The common reading is more idiomatic and effective than Tucker's ἢ 'πὶ (HIII to HIII) πῆμα γίνεται βροτοῖς, which is an anticlimax. Blaydes conjectured ἦτις. Cf. O. C. 1006 εἰ τις

γῆ θεοὺς ἐπίσταται | τιμαῖς σεβίσειν, ἦδε τῶδ' ὑπερφέρε. Trach. 8 νυμφέων ὄκνον | ἄλγιστον εἶχον, εἰ τις Διτῶλός γυνή. Jebb's objection to the superlative ignores the development of the idiom, which has outstripped its logic. See also on fr. 87.

190

τὸ κοῖλον Ἄργος οὐ κατοικήσουτ' ἔτι

190 κατοικήσουτ' Blaydes: κατοικήσαντ' L (κατοικήσαντα m. pr.)

190 Schol. Soph. O. C. 378 πολλὰ καὶ τὸ Ἄργος κοῖλον φασί, καθάπερ καὶ ἐν Ἐπιγόνους 'τὸ κοῖλον... ἔτι.'

κοῖλον. A glance at the map of Argolis will satisfy anyone of the appropriateness of the epithet as a description of the hill-girt Argive valley within the limits of which were situated the ancient towns of Mycenae, Orneae, Midea, and Tiryns: see O. C. 378, 1387 with Jebb's n. on the earlier passage, where the reference to this scholium requires correction.—κατοικήσαντ'. The aorist (see cr. n.) is unsuitable to ἔτι, and I have very little doubt that the future should be substituted: cf. Eur. Hel. 57 τὸ κλεινὸν μ' ἔτι κατοικήσειν πέδον Σπάρτης, ib. 1244, Andr. 858, Suppl. 1231. This conjecture has been anticipated by Blaydes. For the critical difficulties affecting the quotations of the scholiast see the n. on fr. 242.

191

γλῶσσ' ἐν κενοῖσιν ἀνδράσιν τιμὴν ἔχει, ὅπου λόγοι σθένουσι τῶν ἔργων πλέον.

191. 1 ἐν κενοῖσιν Jacobs: ἐν οἷσιν L | ἀνδράσι L | ἔχει Brunck: ἔχεις L

191 Stob. eccl. II 15. 27 p. 189, 22 W. Σοφοκλέους Ἐπιφύλη. 'γλῶσσ'... πλέον.'

1 ἐν κενοῖσιν. I have adopted Jacobs's conjecture as being on the whole the best supplement of the defective text. It seems also to have been made independently by Cobet (P. L. p. 15), and is approved by Wachsmuth. Nauck accepts Dindorf's <ω> γλῶσσ', but strangely enough disregards his ἐν οἷσιν which is its necessary complement; for it is extremely unlikely that two relative clauses are quoted by the anthologist and that the main sentence is omitted. Brunck, without remark, gave ἡ γλῶσσ'... ἔχει, which is open to the same objection. Bamberger conjectured γλῶσσ' ἐν ἐνεοῖσιν, F. W. Schmidt γλῶσσ' ἐν νέοισιν, and Papageorgius γλῶσσ' ἡ ἐν ἐκείνοις (γλῶσσ' ἡ ἐν νέοισιν, Kvičala). Wecklein, retaining ἔχεις, read γλῶσση σὺ τοῖς δ' ἐν.

2 ὅπου. On the assumption that ἐν οἷσιν is retained in the previous line, Blomfield proposed to substitute ἐκεῖ. But it is quite unnecessary to read ὅπου (Wagner) or οἷσιν (F. W. Schmidt), since ὅπου may very well follow a personal antecedent: see Phil. 456 ὅπου θ' ὁ χεῖρων ἀγαθὸν μέισον σθένει... τοῦτους ἐγὼ τοὺς ἀνδρας οὐ στέρω ποτέ. Hdt. 9. 1 ὅκου δὲ ἐκάστωτε γίνονται, τοῦτους παρελάμβανε. fr. 314, 324 ff. (n.).—For the sentiment, which is sufficiently common, cf. O. C. 1143 οὐ γὰρ λόγοισι τὸν βίον σπουδάμεν | λαμπρὸν ποιεῖσθαι μᾶλλον ἢ τοῖς δραμένοις, Eur. Suppl. 907 φιλότιμον ἦθος πλοῦσιον, φρόνημα δὲ | ἐν τοῖσιν ἔργοις, οὐχὶ τοῖς λόγοις, ἔχων (ισον codd. Eur.).

192

ὅπου δὲ μὴ τὰ χρήστ' ἐλευθέρως λέγειν ἔξεστι, νικᾷ δ' ἐν πόλει τὰ χείρονα, ἁμαρτίαι σφάλλουσι τὴν σωτηρίαν.

192. 1 τὰ χρήστ' Reisig: τὰ ῥάιστα vel τὰ ῥάστα codd., τᾶριστ' Wytttenbach, τὰ λῶστ' Blomfield 3 ἁμαρτίαι S: ἁμαρτίας MA

192 Stob. flor. 43. 7 (IV p. 2, 17 Hense) τοῦ αὐτοῦ ([following fr. 84] SA, Σοφοκλέους M) Ἐριφύλη. 'ὅπου... σωτηρίαν.'

12. Reisig's conjecture (see cr. n.) appears most appropriate to the context. Cf. Phil. 456 δῶκεν θ' ὁ χείρων τάχαθ' οὐ μείζον σθένει | κάποφθινει τὰ χρηστὰ χῶ δειλὸς κρατεῖ, | τοῦτους ἐγὼ τοὺς ἄνδρας οὐ στέρξω ποτέ. Observe, however, that here the neuter τὰ χείρονα is not used for the masculine, as τὰ χρηστὰ is there. The schol. on that passage refers to Hom. A 576 ἐπεὶ τὰ χείρονα νικᾷ and to Hes. Op. 193 βλάψει δ' ὁ κακὸς τὸν ἀρείονα φῶτα, and the former of these quotations is certainly echoed here. Homer's phrase became proverbial at a later date: Niceph. Chumn. ap. Boisson. anecd. nov. p. 68 πλεονεκτεῖ δ' ὅμως ἐν τοῦτ' τὰ χείρω, καὶ μῖσος ἀγάπης, καὶ ἐχθρὰ φιλίας. Theodor. Metoch. misc. 58 p. 341 καίτοι τί λέγω, εἰ τὰ χείρω, κατὰ τὸν λόγον, αἰεὶ νικᾷ, καὶ πάσῃ κράσει τῶν ἐναντίων τῶν ἀνιώντων μᾶλλον αἰσθανόμεθα; χρηστός and χείρων are both employed in the political or social sense to express the opposition of the conservative and democratic parties, and the neuter plural might be applied to their respective policies: Eur. Or. 773 ἀλλ' ὅταν χρηστοὺς λάβωσι (sc. προστάτας οἱ πολλοί), χρηστὰ βουλευσοῦσ' αἰεὶ. See Grote, Hist. iii p. 45, Neil's Equites, p. 202 ff. But here the meaning may be quite general.—Herwerden unnecessarily suspects ἐν πόλει on the ground that after ὅπου it is tautologous, and proposes ἐν λόγοις. But the paratactic redundancy is idiomatic: see Jebb's Appendix on O. C. 434.

193

γῆρα προσῆκον σῶζε τὴν εὐθυμίαν.

193 προσῆκον Gaisford: προσήκοντος A, προσόντος M, προσόντος vulgo, προπών- τως Nauck | εὐθυμίαν Dindorf: εὐφημίαν codd.

193 Stob. flor. 117. 3 (IV p. 1055, 4 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἐριφύλη. 'γῆρα... εὐφημίαν.'

This is a difficult fragment and involves the questions, (1) how the second word is to be read, and (2) whether εὐθυμίαν is sound. (1) Brunck printed γῆρας προσόντος, but Dindorf reports him as favouring προσῆκον, which was adopted by Hartung. But γῆρα προσῆκον can hardly mean 'having reached' or 'approached old age.' Bergk proposed προήκον. Recently Nauck's προπώντος has won some acceptance, but, although προπώντος and προσήκοντος were synonymous words, it is improbable that at any period the former would have been explained by the latter. The indications are rather the other way: see Etym. M. p. 690, 21 προσῆκον τὸ πρόπον, Suid. προσῆκει. πρέπει. Blaydes's παροικῶν has no probability. For these reasons I prefer Gaisford's προσῆκον as an acc. abs.: for its use in tragedy cf. Eur. Suppl. 472.

(2) εὐφημίαν cannot mean 'silence'; the last thing that was expected from the old was to refrain from speech. If, on the other hand, we translate 'good name,' there is not much point in urging an old man to be careful of his reputation; and there would be no inducement for the anthologist to include the line under the title ἐπὶ τῷ γῆρας ἀνεπαχθὲς καὶ πολλῆς αἰδοῦς ἄξιον ἢ σύνεσις ἀπεργάζεται. We expect something that is relevant to the general defence of old age. F. W. Schmidt's εὐβουλίαν and εὐρυθμίαν have very little probability; and I think Dindorf's εὐθυμίαν is far better, both for palaeographical reasons and in point of sense. Old age is not burdensome, if it is borne with composure: cf. Plat. rep. 329 D ἀν μὲν γὰρ κόσμοι καὶ εὐκόλοι ὦσιν (scil. οἱ ἄνθρωποι), καὶ τὸ γῆρας μετρίως ἐστὶν ἐπίπονον· εἰ δὲ μὴ, καὶ γῆρας καὶ νεότης χαλεπὴ τῷ τοιοῦτ' συμβαίνει. Anaxandr. fr. 53, II 159 K.

194

ἀρετῆς βέβαιαι δ' εἰσὶν αἱ κτήσεις μόνης.

194 μόνης Naber; μόναι M

194 Stob. flor. i. i (III p. 1, 3 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἐριφύλῃ. 'ἀρετῆς... μόναι.' The extract is omitted by SA, appearing only in M.

The contrast is between the permanence of ἀρετή as a natural endowment, and the instability of wealth. It is explicit in Theogn. 317 τῆς ἀρετῆς τὸν πλοῦτον, ἐπεὶ τὸ μὲν ἔμπεδον αἰεὶ, | χρήματα δ' ἀνθρώπων ἄλλοτε ἄλλος ἔχει. The possession of ἀρετή is a gift of φύσις: see on fr. 808 and the illustrations quoted by Headlam in J. P. XXIII 276, especially

Eur. El. 941 ἡ γὰρ φύσις βέβαιος, οὐ τὰ χρήματα. Sophocles, one may think, would have been on the side of Pindar with his contempt for διδασκαὶ ἀρεταί (Ol. 9. 101) rather than on that of Socrates: contrast Critias fr. 9 Diels ἐκ μελετῆς πλείους ἢ φύσεως ἀγαθοί. In later times the Stoics discussed the question whether virtue once acquired could be lost.—βέβαιαι. The only other instance in tragedy of the fern. termination appears to be Eur. El. 1263. Blaydes proposed to substitute βέβαιαι.

195

ἀνδρῶν γὰρ ἐσθλῶν στέρνον οὐ μαλάσσεται.

195 Stob. flor. 7. 7 (III p. 309, 13 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Ἐριφύλῃ. 'ἀνδρῶν... μαλάσσεται.'

A similar line is quoted from Menand. ποιοσι. 31 ἀνδρὸς πανηροῦ σπλάγχχον οὐ μαλάσσεται, but the application is different. The good man is unshaken in courage, but the bad man is impervious to pity. It should be remembered that θυμός comprehends both anger and courage (cf. Plato's θυμοειδές), so that in common speech the separating line was not clearly drawn. For the softening of anger cf. Eur. Alc. 771 ὀργὰς μαλάσσουσ' ἀνδρός.

The present passage is more akin to Or. 1200 (referring to the cowardly Menelaus) καὶ νῦν δοκῶ... χρόνῳ μαλάξεν σπλάγχχον. οὔτε γὰρ θρασὺς | οὐτ' ἀλκιμος πέφικε. I cannot therefore agree with Nauck, who would restore οὐκ ἀλλάσσεται after Naber and F. W. Schmidt. If any change were necessary, it would be better to adopt Wecklein's suggestion that the line was interrogative; but the tradition indicates that the subject was courage. The figurative use of στέρνον, as applied to the emotions, is peculiar to Sophocles: see Trach. 482, O. C. 487.

196

πῶς οὖν μάχωμαι θνητὸς ὦν θεία τύχη, ὅπου τὸ δευδὼν ἐλπίς οὐδὲν ὠφελεί;

196 Stob. flor. 99. 20 (IV p. 863, 7 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἐριφύλῃ. 'πῶς... ὠφελεί;'

Hope is the common sustenance of men (fr. 948), and their solace in time of danger: Thuc. 5. 103 ἐλπίς κινδύνῳ παραμύθιον οὔσα is an exact parallel to v. 2. So long as the issue is undecided, hope may be cherished (Trach. 723 f. ταρβεῖν μὲν ἔργα δεῖν' ἀναγκαιῶς ἔχει, | τὴν δ' ἐλπίδ' οὐ χρὴ τῆς τύχης κρίνειν πάρος); but it is powerless against divine intervention: Aesch. Supp. 102 ἰάπτει δ' (sc. Ζεὺς) ἐλπίδων ἀφ' ὑψιπύργων πανώλεις βροτούς. But the best illustration of the text will be found in Dem. 18. 97 δεῖ δὲ τοὺς ἀγαθοὺς ἀνδρας ἐγχειρεῖν μὲν ἀπασιν αἰεὶ τοῖς καλοῖς, τὴν ἀγαθὴν προβαλλομένους ἐλπίδα, φέρειν δ' ἂν ὁ θεὸς διδῶ γενναίως. Ribbeck (p. 491) thinks that these are the words of Alcmaeon surrendering himself to his fate; and Immisch, comparing Accius fr. VI qui, nisi genitorem ulso, nullum meis dat finem miseris, infers that in this play Alcmaeon was acting according to the direction of the oracle, and not merely in execution of his father's behest. The sense is grievously marred by Nauck's punctuation (adopted by Dindorf and Campbell), who makes the question end at τύχη, puts a comma after δεινόν, and a full-stop after ώφελεῖ. Hence, inasmuch as v. 2 then becomes contrary to fact—for hope is often serviceable in danger—Bergk and Kock conjectured ἔπου τὸ θεῖον, and F. W. Schmidt ἔπου τὸ δεινὸν ἐπέειπ', οὐδὲν ὠφελεῖ. The reason for this mistaken criticism is that ώφελεῖν is supposed to require a personal object; but Tucker has well shown (C. R. xviii 197) that this is not the case by quoting Eur. fr. 274 τὸ γὰρ ἐπεικέως ὠφελεῖ τὰς ξυμφοράς and fr. 714 πλοῦτος ὠφελεῖ νόσον.

1 θεῖα τύχη, 'heaven-sent doom.' Sophocles is fond of this use of θεῖος, which is illustrated on fr. 650. The meaning of θεοῦ πληγὴ (fr. 961 n.) is similar. For the general sense, the necessity of submitting to the divine ordinance, see on fr. 585.

2 τὸ δεινόν is used as in fr. 351, O. T. 721 τὸ δεινὸν οὐφοβεῖτο.

197

ἀπελθε· κινεῖς ὕπνου ἱατρὸν νόσου.

197 ἀπελθ' ἐκείνης codd.: corr. Nauck | ἱατρὸν codd.

197 Clem. Alex. strom. 6 p. 741 λαβοῖς δ' ἂν ἐκ παραλλήλου...Εὐριπίδου μὲν ἐκ τοῦ Ὁρέστου (211) 'ὦ φίλον ὕπνου θέλγητρον, ἐπικουρον νόσου', Σοφοκλέους δὲ ἐκ τῆς Ἐριφύλης 'ἀπελθ' ἐκείνης ὕπνου ἱατρὸν νόσου.'

The text is corrupt, but it is not easy to decide between Valckenaer's ἀπελθ' ἐκείνης ὕπνος ἱατρὸς νόσου, and Nauck's ἀπελθε· κινεῖς ὕπνου ἱατρὸν νόσου. The latter quotes Eur. Bacch. 690 ἐξ ὕπνου κινεῖν δέμας, and objects to ἐκείνης—on the ground, I suppose, that to particularize is beside the mark. For sleep as a soother of pain cf. Phil. 827 'Τὴν δόνας ἀδᾶς, 'Τῷ δ' ἀλγέων. Orph. h. 85. 5 Ἀβελ λυσίμερμε, κόπων ἡδέϊαν ἔχων ἀνάπαισι, | καὶ πάσης λύτης ἱερὸν παραμύθιον ἔρδων (al. ἔρωων). Wilamowitz (Eur. Her. 2 1 p. 138) plausibly infers that the reference is to Alcmaeon asleep on the stage, and that here, as in the Orestes and Heracles of Euripides, sleep was introduced as succeeding a fit of madness.

198

καὶ γὰρ Ἀργείους ὄρω

198 Prov. cod. Athoi in Miller, Mélanges de litt. gr. p. 363 (II 46) καὶ γὰρ Ἀργείους ὄρω· καὶ αὕτη Σοφοκλείου ἐστὶν ἱαμβεῖον μέτρος· πεποιήται γὰρ ἐκεῖ Ἐριφύλη (περιφυλῆ cod.) πρὸς Ἀλκμαίωνα λέγουσα 'καὶ γὰρ Ἀργείους ὄρω' μέμνηται ταύτης Ἀλεξὶς ἐν Μυλωνῶ (fr. 153, II 353 K.). Proverb. Append. 3. 35 (Paroem. I 423) καὶ γὰρ Ἀργείους ὄρω· αὕτη Σοφοκλείου. πεποιήται γὰρ Ἐριφύλη πρὸς Ἀλκμαίωνα λέγουσα 'καὶ...ὄρω.' εἰρηται δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν ἐκτενῶς πρὸς οὐτοῦν βλέπόντων καὶ καταπληκτικὸν τι δοκούντων ὄραν. οἱ δὲ ἐπὶ τῶν εἰς κλοπὴν ὑπονοουμένων· κωμωδοῦνται γὰρ Ἀργεῖοι ἐπὶ κλοπῇ, ὥσπερ καὶ Σοφοκλῆς (a manifest error for Ἀλεξίς, according to Crusius) ἐχρήσατο. Hesych. I p. 172 Ἀργεῖους ὄρω· παροιμιῶδες. Suid. s.v. Ἀργείους ὄρω. παροιμία ἐπὶ τῶν ἀτενῶς καὶ καταπληκτικῶς ὄρωντων.

Crusius (Analecta Critica, p. 151) explains that the comic poet quoted the words of Sophocles with the addition παρὰ προσδοκίαν of τοὺς φῶρας or something of the kind, so that Ἀργεῖος bears the meaning of φανερός (cf. ὄργος). He points out that Aristophanes had also spoken of 'Argive thieves' with the same intention: Suid. s.v. Ἀργεῖοι φῶρες· ἐπὶ τῶν προσδήλως πονηρῶν· οἱ Ἀργεῖοι ἐπὶ κλοπῇ κωμωδοῦνται. Ἀριστοφάνης Ἀναγύρω (fr. 57, I 406 K.). The verbal play is of the same kind as βούρ· Κύπριος (κόπριος), κακῶν Ἰλίδος (ἱλῆ), δαίμων Αἰνείος (αἰνός), and a number of others: ibid. p. 55. That this use of ὄργος was possible is shown by one of the derivations given to Ἀργεῖος, i.e. τρανῶς ἀποφαιδόμενος (Hesych. I p. 273). Thus, the two explanations in Prov. Append. 3. 35

(εἰρηται δὲ... οἱ δὲ...) are adapted respectively to the quotations from Sophocles and Alexis. The same critic (Philol. XLVI 616) refers to this passage Aristophan fr. 4, II 277 K. παλαιστὴν νόμισον Ἀργείων μὲν ὄραν. Blaydes compares Ar. Ran. 653 ἰσπείας ὄρῳ, put forward to explain a cry of pain.

The words were spoken by Eriphyle to Alcmaeon, and were famous as having occurred at the culminating point of a scene marked by the most intense form of tragic emotion. Eriphyle was conscious of having betrayed the expedition of Adrastus, and the appearance—real or imagined—of the Argives was calculated to fill her with terror. Ribbeck, p. 494, thought that Eriphyle implored Alcmaeon to stay his hand, declaring that she could see an Argive army hurrying forward to intervene in her favour; but this interpretation is excluded by the words τῶν καταπληκτικὸν τι δοκούστων ὄραν.

ΕΡΙΣ

The reading Ἴρις in Athen. 646 D, preferred by Casaubon, Brunck, and Boeckh as the title of this play, is now exploded. Welcker (Nachtr. p. 313), quoting Plat. rep. 379 E θεῶν ἔριν τε καὶ κρίσιν διὰ Θέμιτός τε καὶ Διός, conjectured that the subject was the contention between Zeus and Poseidon for the hand of Themis. This strange blunder is reproduced by Dindorf without any intimation that Welcker had confused Themis and Thetis: cf. Pind. Isth. 8. 27 Ζεὺς ὅτ' ἀμφὶ Θέτιος ἀγλαίς τ' ἔρισαν Ποσειδᾶν γάμφ.

I would rather suppose that the Ἔρις was a companion-play to the Κρίσις, and that its subject was the strife between the three goddesses at the marriage of Peleus and Thetis. See Proclus's abstract of the Cypria (EGF p. 17): παραγενομένη δὲ Ἔρις εὐωχουμένων τῶν θεῶν ἐν τοῖς Πηλέως γάμοις νεῖκος περὶ κάλλους ἐνίστησιν Ἀθηνᾶ Ἡρᾶ καὶ Ἀφροδίτη, αἱ πρὸς Ἀλέξανδρον ἐν Ἰδῇ κατὰ Διὸς προσταγὴν ὑφ' Ἑρμοῦ πρὸς τὴν κρίσιν ἄγονται κτέ. The golden apple which Eris dropped on the table with its inscription 'A gift to the fairest' is mentioned by a number of the later authorities (collected by Waser in Pauly-Wissowa VI 465), and several critics have inferred that it was an addition to the original story. Though omitted by Proclus, the apple appears in the very much abbreviated account in Apollod. epit. 3. 2, and there is nothing to prove that it could not have been mentioned in a satyr-play of Sophocles. It is obvious that the marriage of Peleus and Thetis was an occasion on which a chorus of satyrs might very well have been present, and the fragments, so far as they go, support the idea of a banquet. Two considerations which make in favour of this conjecture deserve to be stated: (1) the frequency with which ἔρις, especially in conjunction with κρίσις, appears as a fixed term for the quarrel of the three goddesses, as in the Argument to Colluthus, ἀρπαγή 'Ελένης: τὴν τῆς Ἐριδος σύγχυσιν καὶ ἔριν περὶ τοῦ μήλου. Cf. Eur. Hec. 644 ἐκρίθη δ' ἔρις ἀν' ἐν Ἰῖδα κρίνει τρισσὰς μακάρων | παῖδας ἀνὴρ βούτας. Andr. 276 τρίπωλον ἄρμα δαιμόνων ἄγων (sc. Hermes) τὸ καλλιζυγές, | ἔριδι στυγερᾷ κεκορυθμενον εὐμορφίας. Hel. 708 θεῶν τρισσὼν ἔρις. I.A. 183 Ἦρα Παλλάδι τ' ἔριν ἔριν | μορφᾶς ἅ Κῦπρις ἔσχευ. ib. 1307 κρίσιν ἐπὶ στυγρὰν ἔριν τε καλλονᾶς. Isocr. 10. 41 γενομένης ἐν θεοῖς περὶ καλλοὺς Ἐριδος, ἧς Ἀλέξανδρος ὁ Πριάμου κατέστη κριτής. There is very little doubt that to this list should be added the passage of Plato quoted by Welcker, seeing that Themis is mentioned in the abstract of Proclus as taking counsel with Zeus: see Adam's note. (2) If Ἐρις is to be taken as a personification, the incident in question is much the most famous affair in which she was engaged¹.

¹ See Gruppe, p. 665.

199

ἐγὼ δὲ πυνώωσ' αὖ πρὸς ἴτρια βλέπω.

199 πυνώωσαν A: corr. Musurus

199 Athen. 646 D Ἰτριον πεμμάτιον λεπτὸν διὰ σφάμου καὶ μέλιτος γινόμενον. μνημονεύει αὐτοῦ... Σοφοκλῆς Ἐριδι ἐγὼ... βλέπω.

πρὸς ἴτρια βλέπω, 'cast a longing eye on the cakes,' is a less contemptuous form of the Aristophanic πρὸς ταῦτα κεχηνώς (Nub. 997). Cf. Plat. sympr. 181 B πρὸς τὸ διαπράσσειν μόνον βλέποντες. Blaydes on Ar. Lys. 427 quotes Eur. fr. 162 ἀνδρὸς δ' ὀρώντος εἰς Κῦπριν νεανίου, Theocr. 13. 12 οὐθ' ὀπὸς δ' ὀρτάλχοι μινυροί ποτὶ κοῖτον ὀρῶν. So perhaps Ani. 30 εἰσὼρῶσι πρὸς χάριν βορᾶς. For ἴτρια cf. Anacreon fr. 17 ἡρίστησα μὲν ἰτρίων λεπτοῦ μικρὸν ἀποκλᾶς.—Kaibel questions whether the generally accepted correction of Musurus (see cr. n.) is sound. It is certainly not convincing, but nothing better has been suggested.—Ahrens thought that Aphrodite was the speaker, and that she was bored with Athena's sage counsel.

200

εὐωρος γάμου

200 γάμος cod.: corr. Nauck

200 Hesych. II p. 237 εὐωρος γάμος. Σοφοκλῆς Ἐριδι. ἦτοι ὥριος (ὠραίος Nauck) ἢ ὀλιγωρος. οὕτω γὰρ λέγουσι κατὰ ἀντίφρασιν, ὡς ὁ αὐτὸς ἐν Σκυρίαίς (fr. 561) χρῆται τῷ εὐωρίαίῳ.

Nauck pointed out that the interpretation ὀλιγωρος, although wrong in itself, shows that γάμον and not γάμος is the correct reading. An example of εὐωρος in the sense of 'neglectful' is quoted from Euphor. fr. 102 οὐδέ τοι εὐωροι θυῶν.

Hesych. also mentions εὐωρος as an epithet of γῆ, i.e. ἡ τὰ ὠραία ἔχουσα. For the genitive depending on the adj. cf. Eur. Hel. 12 ἐπεὶ δ' ἐς ἡβην ἦλθεν ὠραίαν γάμων (n.), and for further illustrations of similar genitives Kuehner-Gerth I 371. Pierson on Moeris p. 426. For κατ' ἀντίφρασιν see on fr. 116.

¹ When the above was written, I was unaware that the same view of the contents of the Ἐρις had been advocated by Bergk (de frag. Soph. p. 10), as well as by Ahrens, who threw out the suggestion that possibly Ἐρις was an alternative title to the play known as Κρίσις. The latter identification, for which there is little to be said, was also approved by Wagner.

201

μῖαν μῖαν

201 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 108, 9 μῖαν μῖαν ἂντι τοῦ κατὰ μῖαν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἐριδι.

It must be assumed that this was a colloquialism for 'one by one,' or 'one and then another.' Brunnck compares Ar. Vesp. 213 τί οὐκ ἀπεκοιμήθημεν ὅσον ὅσον στίλην; So μάλλον μάλλον in Eur. I. T. 1406 μάλλον δὲ μάλλον πρὸς πέτρας ἤει σκάφος, and see Phot. lex. p. 244, 21. Ar. Nub. 1288 πλέον πλέον τάργυριον δὲ γίνεται. Antiph. fr. 10, 11 15 K. μείζον μείζον. Catull. 64. 275 magis magis increbrescent. Examples from modern Greek are adduced in the authorities quoted by Thumb, die gr. Spr. in Zeitalter d. Hellenismus, p. 128.

ΕΡΜΙΟΝΗ

The plot of this play proceeds on parallel lines to that of Euripides' Andromache. Our authorities for the contents are as follows: Eustath. Od. p. 1479, 10 Σοφοκλῆς δέ, φασίν, ἐν Ἑρμιόνη ιστορεῖ ἐν Τροίᾳ ὄντος ἔτι Μενελάου ἐκδοθῆναι τὴν Ἑρμιόνην ὑπὸ τοῦ Τυνδάρεω τῷ Ὀρέστῃ· εἰτα ὕστερον ἀφαιρεθεῖσαν αὐτοῦ ἐκδοθῆναι τῷ Νεοπτολέμῳ κατὰ τὴν ἐν Τροίᾳ ὑπόσχεσιν· αὐτοῦ δὲ Πυθοῖ ἀναιρεθέντος ὑπὸ Μαχαιρέως, ὅτε τὸν Ἀπόλλω τινύμενος τὸν τοῦ πατρὸς ἐξεδίκει φόνον, ἀποκαταστήναι αὐτὴν αὐτὴν τῷ Ὀρέστῃ· ἐξ ὧν γενέσθαι τὸν Τισαμενὸν φερωνύμῳς οὕτω κληθέντα παρὰ τὴν μετὰ μένους τίσιν, ἐπεὶ ὁ πατὴρ Ὀρέστης ἐτίσατο τοὺς φονεῖς τοῦ Ἀγαμέμνονος. The schol. on δ 4 is identical in substance, though the language is somewhat different, and the clause ὅτε...φόνον and all that follows Τισαμενόν are omitted. But ὑπὸ Τυνδάρεω is given in the MSS in place of ὑπὸ Μαχαιρέως, which is restored by Dindorf. The only other allusion to Sophocles in relation to this subject occurs in schol. Eur. Or. 1655 which, after some remarks concerning Euripides alone, proceeds as follows: Φερεκύδης φησὶ (FHG I 94) περὶ παίδων χρησμὸν αἰτοῦντα τὸν Νεοπτόλεμον ἀναιρεθῆναι· ἐπεὶ Νεοπτόλεμος Ἑρμιόνην γαμῆ τὴν Μενελάου, καὶ ἔρχεται εἰς Δελφούς περὶ παίδων χρησόμενος· οὐ γὰρ αὐτῷ ἐγένοντο ἐξ Ἑρμιόνης. καὶ ὁρῶν κατὰ τὸ χρηστήριον κρέα διαρπάζοντας τοὺς Δελφούς, ἀφαιρεῖται τὰ κρέα αὐτοῦς, ἐαυτὸν δὲ κτείνει μαχαίρᾳ. ὁ δὲ τούτων ἱερεὺς (αὐτὸν δὲ κτείνει Μαχαιρεὺς ὁ τούτων ἱερεὺς καὶ conj. Leopardi) κατορύσσει αὐτὸν ὑπὸ τὸν οὐδὸν τοῦ νεώ. ταῦτα γενεαλογεῖ καὶ Σοφοκλῆς. It is not at all clear what meaning should be given to the cryptic utterance in the last sentence; but I cannot agree with Welcker (p. 220 ff.) that we are entitled to assume that Sophocles followed the account of Pherecydes in respect either (1) to the motive of Neoptolemus in visiting Delphi¹, or (2) to the origin of the brawl with the priests. Welcker makes several other assumptions which cannot be justified: that Orestes plotted against the life of Neoptolemus, as in Euripides; that the scene of the play was laid at Delphi; that Hermione was forcibly carried off by Neoptolemus, and sighed for her former lover Orestes, as in Ovid (Her. 8); that Pylades assisted Orestes in attacking Neoptolemus; and that Neoptolemus in a dying speech directed that Andromache should be sent to Helenus. There is not a scrap of evidence to support these inferences; and it is far better to adhere strictly to the statement of Eustathius, who is our only explicit authority. A tragedy upon this subject was also written by Philocles², who is known to us from several allusions in Aristophanes: see schol. on Eur. Andr. 32. The title Hermione is also found among the works of Livius Andronicus and Pacuvius; and several fragments of the latter's play are preserved, and are used by Welcker for the purpose of reconstructing the play of Sophocles³. The objections to this method have been pointed out in several other cases.

The principal facts which emerge from the statement of Eustathius are: (1) the betrothal of Hermione by Tyndareus, during the absence of Menelaus at Troy. For this cf. Serv. on Verg. Aen. 3. 328 hanc Hermionam quidam dicunt, cum Oresti esset desponsata, post a Menelao apud Troiam admirante virtutem Pyrrhi esse promissam: alii dicunt a Menelao quidem apud Ilium Pyrrho desponsatam; sed a Tyndareo Oresti morante apud Troiam Pyrrho, ut quidam promissam, ut quidam coniunctam tradunt. Ov. Her. 8. 31 me tibi Tyndareus, vita gravis auctor et annis | tradidit: arbitrium neptis habebat avus; | at pater Aeacidæ promiserat inscius acti, etc. To the same effect Hygin. fab. 123. (2) Neoptolemus was slain by Machaereus at Delphi. This is related by several authorities, from whom we learn that Machaereus was one of the priests of Apollo: cf. Strabo 421 Μαχαίρεως Δελφοῦ ἀνδρὸς ἀνελόντος αὐτόν, ὡς μὲν ὁ μῦθος, δίκας αἰτοῦντα τὸν θεὸν τοῦ πατρὸς φόνου, ὡς δὲ τὸ εἶκος, ἐπιθέμενον τῷ ἱερῷ. Pausan. 10. 24. 4 Νεοπτόλεμον...ὁ ἱερεὺς ἀπέκτεινε τοῦ Ἀπόλλωνος. Tryphiod. 642 ζαθέον δηλήμονα νηοῦ | Δελφὸς ἀνὴρ ἐλάσας ἱερῇ κατέπεφνε μαχαίρῃ. It is important to observe that the schol. on Pind. Nem. 7. 62, quotes Asclepiades' τραγωδοῦμενα (FHG III 303) in support of his remark that all the poets agree in naming Machaereus as responsible for the death of Neoptolemus. Pindar, in his Paeon to the Delphians (6. 118, Oxyrh. Pap. v 47), had given offence to the Aeginetans by the words ἀμφιπόλοις δὲ | μοιριᾶν περὶ τιμᾶν | δηριαζόμενον κτάνεν | ἐν τεμένει φίλῳ γᾶς | παρ' ὀμφαλὸν εὐρύν, which seemed to them to suggest that Neoptolemus was guilty of sacrilege. The cause of the quarrel was clearly not so well-known as to leave Pindar's expression free from doubt; and the newly discovered scholia give various explanations: ἦτοι τῶν κρεῶν ἢ διαρπαζόντων συνήθως τῶν ἄλλων ἐδυσχέρανε καὶ ἐκώλυε διὸ καὶ ἀνῆρηται ἢ τῶν χρημάτων ἃ διαρπάζων εἰς ἐκδικίαν τοῦ πατρὸς ἀνῆρέθη. In Nem. 7. 42 Pindar explains that he meant the first,—ἵνα κρεῶν νιν ὑπὲρ μάχας | ἔλασεν ἀντιτυχόντ' ἀνὴρ μαχαίρα: but the account of Eustathius, so far as it goes, suggests that in Sophocles Neoptolemus was the aggressor. (3) The subsequent birth of Tisamenus to Hermione and Orestes, and the derivation of his name. It is impossible to feel sure that these come from Sophocles: in any case, they can only have been mentioned incidentally. For the fact cf. Pausan. 2. 18. 6.

¹ Ribbeck, Röm. Trag. p. 262, agrees with Welcker, and actually attributes the introduction of the words ταῦτα (or ταῦτά) γενεαλογεῖ to the operation of this motive. More to the point is his reference to Diog. L. 1. 119, where Pherecydes himself is called γενεαλόγος. Wagner (Epit. Vat. p. 276a) was perhaps right in referring the words to the genealogy of Tisamenus, as related at the end of the play.

² See TGF p. 760, where it is hinted that the name of Philocles may have been substituted in error for that of Sophocles.

³ Wagner and Ribbeck make much of Pacuv. fr. 1 quo tandem ipsa orbitas | grandaevitasque Pelei penuriam | stirpis subauxit, as confirming the view of Welcker that in Sophocles Neoptolemus went to Delphi to enquire how he might become a father. It is manifest that the words quoted do not warrant the inference that has been drawn from them.

Wagner (Epit. Vat. p. 274 ff.) throws doubt on the account of Eustathius for quite inadequate reasons, and prefers to follow the guesses of Welcker and Ribbeck to the plain statement of our only direct authority. He treats Sophocles as the source of Apollod. epit. 6. 14, and would accordingly restore ὑπὸ Ὁρέστου rather than ὑπὸ Μαχαιρέως for the corrupt ὑπὸ Τυνδάρεω in schol. Hom. δ 4. Schwartz, on the other hand, rightly considers¹ that the epitome is drawn in the main from Euripides, but contains a single motive taken from the Hermione of Sophocles.

Vater suggested that, if fr. 872 belongs to this play, the plot may have been similar to the conclusion of Euripides' Orestes. But, in view of the evidence already discussed, it is clear that fr. 872 belongs elsewhere.

¹ Pauly-Wissowa I 2879.

202

ἀλλ' ὦ πατρώας γῆς ἀγνυαίου πέδον

202 Steph. Byz. p. 22, 4 ἀγνυά-τόπος δηλῶν τὴν ἐν τῇ πόλει πορευτὴν ὁδόν... τὸ τοπικὸν ἀγνυαῖος. Σοφοκλῆς 'Ερμιόνη' ἀλλ'...πέδον.' τὸ δὲ ἀγνυαῖος ὡς ἀρουραῖος.

Meineke conjectured ἀγνυαῖον, which would be in accordance with Ai. 859 ὦ γῆς ἱερὸν οἰκείας πέδον Σαλαμῖνος and Eur. fr. 558 ὦ γῆς πατρώας χαῖρε φίλτατον πέδον. But no rigid rule can be laid down: cf. Ai. 135 τῆς ἀμφιπότου Σαλαμῖνος ἔχων βάθρον ἀγχιάλου, where Bothe's ἀγχιάλου has not won acceptance. See also Elmsley on Eur. Hclid. 750. — L. and S. strangely connect this adjective with Apollo 'Ἀγνυεός. There is no reason to doubt that it simply means 'provided with streets,' as a town settlement.

203

γνωστός

203 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 87, 25 γνωστός ἀντὶ τοῦ γνώριμος. Σοφοκλῆς 'Ερμιόνη'.

Nauck contends that γνωστός ought to be written as in fr. 282; but see Jebb on O. T. 361 and the Appendix. He also retains κλαυστά in O. C. 1360. The question of the origin of this intrusive σ was discussed at length by Curtius, Greek Verb, pp. 519—526, but his conclusions are now out of date. The form in -στος, where not phonetically justified, must be attributed to the working of analogy; γνωστός is thus necessarily later than γνωτός, although the contrary view was formerly held (Blomfield on Aesch. Pers. 403).

ΕΥΜΗΛΟΣ

Eumelus, as Welcker remarks (p. 66), is not a tragic hero; and nothing is known of any person bearing this name which appears suitable for the subject of a tragedy¹. Moreover, it is only in Harpocration that the title appears; for in fr. 204 Εὐμήλω is an emendation for ἀμήλω. The best-known Eumelus is the son of Admetus and Alcestis, who actually appears in the Alcestis of Euripides. He commanded a contingent in the Trojan war (B 711 ff.); was famous for his horses (ib. 763 ff.); appeared as a competitor in the chariot race at the funeral games of Patroclus (Ψ 288 ff.), when he received something in the nature of a 'consolation' prize; and won the first prize at the games held for Achilles (Apollod. epit. 5, 5). Later he was one of the heroes in the wooden horse (Quint. 12. 324). Hence Meineke, concluding that he probably survived the war, referred fr. 911 to this play. Blomfield's conjecture 'Αμύκω for Εὐμήλω is improbable.

¹ Wagner's extraordinary identification of the hero of this tragedy with the Eumelus of Anton. Lib. 18, Ov. Met. 7, 390, requires no refutation.

204

ἀσάμινθος

204 Hesych. I p. 79 αἱματώσασαι ἀρρᾶς· αἱματος κορέσαι τὸ δόρυ. ἡ αἱματι μολύναι καὶ χρώσαι αὐτό· ἀση γὰρ ἡ ῥυπαρία. ὅθεν καὶ ἀσάμεθα, ἐν ᾗ τὴν ἀσην μυνύθοντε ἐνεορεῖ. Σοφοκλῆς ἀμήλῳ.

Εὐμήλῳ was restored by Musurus; and the corruption of eu to a is frequent in Hesychius. Blomfield conjectured 'Αμύκω, and Blaydes approved. The gloss has been further restored so as to read αἱματος ἄσαι 'Αρρα...ὅθεν καὶ ἀσάμινθος, ἐν ᾗ τὴν ἀσην...μυνύθοντες ἐλούοντο. For that is the form in which the lemma and gloss occur in Suid. s.v., and Bekk. anecd. p. 358, 31, with the addition of the words ὅ ἐστι τὴν ῥυπαρίαν μειοῦντες after ἐλούοντο. Suid. omits τὸ δόρυ after κορέσαι, and neither has αὐτό after χρώσαι, or any trace of ἐνεορεῖ or of the reference to Sophocles.

A few lines below Hesychius has αἱματώσαι· φονεῖσαι. ἡ φονίζαι. Consequently, M. Schmidt conjectured that the words following μυνύθοντε belonged properly to this gloss, and should be emended to ἐναρεῖν Σ. Ε. This conjecture is supported by fr. 987. On the other hand, Schmidt is obliged to assume not merely that the words in question have been accidentally shifted, but also that they have driven out the conclusion of the clause ἐν ᾗ κτέ., leaving a gap. It might be possible to account for ἐνεορεῖ by reading ἐμύνθον οἱ ἀρχαῖοι, or even μυνύθων ἐνεχώρει. So R. Ellis conjectured μυνύθων τις ἀναίρει. But, for reasons already given, it can hardly be doubted that the gloss of Hesychius has been mutilated, and that it was originally identical with that of Suidas. See also Suid. s.v. ἀσάμινθος. ἡ πύελος, ἡ σκάφη· ἐν αἷσι οἱ ἀρχαῖοι ἐλούοντο. οὐκ ἦσαν γὰρ βαλανεῖα. παρὰ τὸ τὴν ἀσην μυνύθων. Similarly Etym. M. p. 151, 52. Etym. Gud. p. 82, 45.

For the derivation of ἀσάμινθος cf. Apollon. lex. p. 45, 6 ἀσάμινθος. πύελος. ἀπὸ τοῦ τὴν ἀσην μυνύθων, ὅ ἐστιν ἐλαττοῦν. Schol. Hom. θ 450 ἀσάμινθος λέγεται διὰ τὸ μυνύθων καὶ οἷον ἀφανίζειν τὴν ἀσην ἥτοι τὸν ῥύπον. To the same effect schol. K 576.

There is no reason why Sophocles should not have introduced the Homeric ἀσάμινθος, although Bergk (PLG III 213) is hardly justified in attributing to him the words φοιβανάτω δὲ τις ἀσάμινθον quoted without an author's name by Etym. M. p. 797, 7.

205

καθελών

205 Harpocr. p. 104, 18 καθελών... ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀνελών ἢ ἀποκτείνας. ἐχρήσαντο δὲ οὕτω τῷ ὀνόματι καὶ ἄλλοι, ὡς καὶ Σησίχορος ἐν Ἰλίου πέρσειδι (fr. 23) καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Εὐμήλῳ. Phot. lex. p. 122, 1 καθελών· Δημοσθένης (23. 53) ἀντὶ τοῦ ἀνελών ἥτοι ἀποκτείνας, καὶ Σησίχορος καὶ Σοφοκλῆς.

The passage quoted from Demosthenes is actually from the text of a law: ἐάν τις ἀποκτείνῃ ἐν ἀθλοῖς ἄκων ἢ ἐν ὁδῷ καθελών, and no inference should be drawn from it for the usage of Attic prose. In the wider sense of to overthrow the examples are more numerous: v. lex. For Sophocles cf. Trach. 1063 μόνῃ με δὴ καθέλει φασγάνου δίχα, Al. 517 (μῦρα) καθέλειεν Ἀἰδὸν θανασίμους οἰκήτορας, O. C. 1689 κατὰ με φόνιος Ἀἴδας ἔλοι πατρὶ ξυθανεῖν γεραίῳ.

ΕΥΡΥΑΛΟΣ

The play of Sophocles is cited by Eustath. Od. p. 1796, 52 κατὰ δὲ Λυσίμαχον (ἐν Νόστοις) υἱὸς αὐτῷ ἐξ Εὐύππης Θεσπρωτίδος Λεοντόφρων, ὃν ἄλλοι Δόρυκλόν φασι. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐκ τῆς αὐτῆς Εὐρύαλον ἱστορεῖ, ὃν ἀπέκτεινε Τηλέμαχος. The story of Euryalus is told by Parthenius, narrat. ant. 3. After the slaying of the suitors, Odysseus crossed over to Epirus on account of an oracular command; and, while hospitably entertained by Tyrimmas, became intimate with his daughter Euippe, and by her the father of a son Euryalus. When the latter had arrived at full age, his mother sent him to Ithaca, with certain tokens proving his identity. Odysseus happened to be away from home when he arrived; and Penelope, who had previously learnt something of her husband's passion for Euippe, found an opportunity to satisfy herself of the whole truth. Accordingly, when Odysseus returned, without informing him of the real position, she persuaded him that Euryalus was plotting against his life, and should be put to death. Odysseus was thus induced to slay his own child, not very long before he was himself killed by Telegonus. It will be observed that Eustathius speaks of Telemachus and not of Odysseus himself as the actual slayer. In the concluding words of Parthenius Meineke found a senarius τρωθεὶς ἀκάνθη τρυγόνος θαλασσίας, for which see the Introductory Note to the Ὀδυσσεὺς ἀκανθοπλήξ. Wilamowitz, Hom. Unters. p. 191, holds that Parthenius is an entirely untrustworthy source for the reconstruction of Sophocles' play, and that we must not accept his authority for the line recovered by Meineke, or believe that Tyrimmas was the name given by Sophocles to Euippe's father. But his scepticism has not found favour with subsequent critics: see the authorities cited by Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 625₁₀. Gruppe himself holds that the story belongs to a stratum of Thesprotian and Epirote legend which was older than the Ionian epos. Recently, Vürtheim (Mnem. XXIX 57) has given reasons for preferring the statement of Parthenius that Odysseus rather than Telemachus was the slayer of Euryalus: he urges that the homicide was used by Sophocles as preparatory for the Niptra, in order to vindicate the poetic justice of the sequel, and that Penelope's vengeance would have been incompletely executed unless the father had been induced to become the slayer of his son.

ΕΥΡΥΠΥΛΟΣ

The story of Eurypylus,—of his alliance with the Trojans, and his death in battle,—fell within the period covered by the Little Iliad. He was the son and successor of the Mysian Telephus, and his mother was Astyoche, the sister of Priam. Homer (λ 519 ff.), in referring to the exploits of Neoptolemus, selects as the greatest of his achievements his victory over the hero Eurypylus, the son of Telephus, who was slain, together with many of his Cetean followers, 'by reason of the gifts sent to a woman.' The allusion implies a further knowledge of the history of Eurypylus, and is variously elucidated in the scholia. For the present purpose it is sufficient to take account of the explanation attributed to Acusilaus (FHG I 103). According to this, Priam, hearing of the power of Eurypylus, sent a message to him asking for his assistance. Eurypylus replied that his mother would not permit him to render it; whereupon Priam sent as a gift to Astyoche the golden vine which Zeus had given to Laomedon (or Tros¹) as compensation for the seizure of Ganymede, and which he himself had received as an heirloom. That this version was ultimately derived from the Little Iliad is made almost a certainty by the mention in one of the fragments (fr. 6 K.) of the golden vine as the gift of Hephaestus to Zeus, and as subsequently passing to Laomedon as the price of Ganymede. Proclus² merely states that Eurypylus came to the assistance of the Trojans, and, after heroically serving their cause, was slain by Neoptolemus. Pausanias (3. 26. 9) gives the Little Iliad (fr. 7 K.) as his authority for the statement that Machaon was one of the Greeks who were killed by Eurypylus. Another notable victim who fell by his sword was Nireus (Hygin. fab. 113, Quint. 6. 372).

The arrival of Eurypylus, his entertainment by the Trojans, his departure for the field of battle, and his immediate successes are the principal subjects of the sixth book of Quintus; and these events are related in such a spirit as leaves upon the reader the impression that the fame of Eurypylus as the last hope of a losing cause (Soph. fr. 210, 76 f.) must have been widely celebrated by earlier poets whose works are now lost. It should be added that Quintus, although he mentions Astyoche (6. 136) as sister of Priam and mother of Telephus, says nothing whatever about the gift to her of the golden vine. On the other hand, it is remarkable that Strabo (615 f.) dismisses the story of Eurypylus and his Ceteans, and the allusion in the words γυναικὸν εἵνεκα δώρων, as riddles in the text of Homer the solution of which is past discovery. Nevertheless, he adds, the grammarians give a supply of tales in their commentaries which are tedious rather than convincing.

Among the writings which Quintus may have utilized was the tragedy entitled Eurypylus, known until recently only from the catalogue given by Aristotle (poet. 23. 1459^b 6), of plays drawn from the Little Iliad, and classed by Nauck (p. 838) among those of uncertain authorship. The fact that Aristotle does not name the author is no reason for refusing to attribute it to one of the great tragedians, since the Λάκαιναι of Sophocles and the Ὀπλων κρίσις of Aeschylus appear in the same list; and Tyrwhitt, in his commentary on the poetics, inferred from Plut. coh. ir. 16 p. 463 D that the Eurypylus was written by Sophocles. This conjecture has now been completely confirmed by the papyrus fragments published as no. 1175 of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri (IX 86 ff.). The circumstances of their discovery¹, no less than the internal evidence afforded by their contents, suffice to show that a play whose subject-matter comprised the death of Eurypylus was composed by Sophocles; and, if Eurypylus was not the title, at least we know of no other which could be so fitly applied to it.

¹ In Hom. E 265 Tros is the father of Ganymede and receives the immortal horses in payment. Schol. A 521 accordingly names Tros as recipient of the golden vine. Acusilaus is not cited for these details, but there is no doubt that Laomedon was mentioned in this connexion by the author of the Little Iliad (supr.). The bribe of the golden vine is in Serv. Verg. Aen. 1. 489 transferred to Tithonus, the father of Memnon.

² EGF p. 37. Apollod. epit. 5. 12 adds nothing of importance.

The papyrus is terribly mutilated, and does not permit any conclusion to be formed in regard to the development of the plot. The only part which is continuously legible comprises a dialogue between a woman lamenting the death of a Trojan partisan and the chorus who sympathize with her. The former, who reproaches herself as justly punished by the disaster, must apparently be identified with Astyoche². The dialogue is succeeded by the concluding portion of a messenger's speech, which detailed the scene enacted over the dead body of Eurypylus after the Greeks had retired, and the despair of Priam at the failure of his last hope. In the column which precedes the dialogue above referred to, only the concluding letters of each line are decipherable; but it is manifest that it originally contained the earlier narrative of the messenger, describing the duel between Neoptolemus and Eurypylus and its result. The fragment preserved by Plutarch (fr. 768 N.), which we have already mentioned, portrayed the stern self-restraint of the two heroes as they advanced to the conflict, and the words χαλκῶν ὀπλων, with which that fragment ended, are still legible in the papyrus. The identification, which was made by Wilamowitz, appears to be certain; for, although the remnants are insufficient in themselves to clinch the argument, the appearance of these particular words at the very point where we should have expected to find Plutarch's quotation, is a coincidence too remarkable to be ignored.

¹ See the details given by the editor at pp. 30, 86, of their relation to the papyrus containing the Ichnēutae. It is worth remarking that Weil (Rev. des Ét. gr. III 343) had drawn a correct inference from Plutarch's fragment: 'Il résulte...que Sophocle traita dans une de ses tragédies le sujet qu'Aristote désigne du nom d'Εὐρύπυλος en énumérant les drames tirés de la Petite Iliade. La mère d'Eurypyle, Astyoche, cette autre Eriphyle, était sans doute un des principaux personnages de cette tragédie.'

² The appearance of Astyoche at Troy is consistent with the legend that she and her sisters together with others of the Trojan women were taken to Italy after the sack of the city (Tzet. Lycophr. 921, 1075).

The position of the remaining fragments is quite uncertain, and none of them yields any consecutive sense without the addition of hazardous restorations¹. A few conjectures concerning their order and contents will be mentioned below, and need not be repeated here. It should, however, be stated that on the Tabula Iliaca, immediately before the representation of the death of Eurypylus, there is an unidentified scene in which two men stand before an altar; and it has been conjectured by Wilamowitz² that one of them is Eurypylus, who is promising deliverance to the Trojans. Even if he is right, it does not follow that a similar scene occurred in Sophocles, but it is highly probable that the earlier part of the play was occupied with the arrival of Eurypylus and his welcome by Priam.

The younger Philostratus (imag. 11) describes a painting which represented the duel of Eurypylus and Neoptolemus. The greater part of his sketch is taken up with an elaborate account of the shield of Neoptolemus, based upon the famous description in the eighteenth Iliad; and there is scarcely anything which can be supposed to illustrate Sophocles, unless it be the opening words (τὰ Εὐρυπύλου καὶ Νεοπτολέμου ποιητῶν ὕμνῳ χορὸς πατρώξειν τε αὐτοὺς ἄμφω καὶ τὴν χεῖρα εὐδοκίμους κατ' ἰσχὺν εἶναι).

The new papyrus, as well as that of the Ichneutae, is dated as belonging to the latter part of the second century.

206

A. αἰ[
ἐρω[ χαλι[νο ἐλθόν[τ αὐτός σ[ε εἶπ[

5

206. 6 post εἰρ (quod ut εἰ[ρ]γ quoque legi potest) litterae ων in pap. deletae sunt

¹ In the editio princeps of the papyrus as many as 107 fragments were published. Most of these consist of isolated letters and parts of words belonging to three or four or occasionally more successive lines, so that, even where the restoration of a particular word is reasonably certain, it remains entirely insignificant. In such cases, and also where a complete word is legible, but that word is so common that its attribution to Sophocles has no feature of interest, I have not thought it necessary to reprint the existing vestiges. It is possible, though not, it would seem, very probable, that some of these fragments by combination with other parts of the papyrus may ultimately acquire significance; but that result would not be promoted by their reappearance in this volume.

² Isyllus, p. 488.

- B. ποία δὲ [
Σκύρου τ[
A. τοσοῦ[
πολ[10
B. ἀλλ[
ἐμα[
A. Τ[ρ]ω[
B. . [.] . γὰρ[ρ
A. λείπε[ι 15
B. ἐλθόντ[
A. μόνον [
B. λόγοις μ[

14--16 a prioribus discissa coniectura satis probabili huc relata

206 Wilamowitz conjectured that this and the two following fragments belonged to a dialogue between Eurypylos and Neoptolemus, which, in accordance with the usage of epic poetry, preceded their encounter. The reference to Scyros in v. 8 is thought to favour this view, but might have been made by another speaker as well as by Neoptolemus. On the other hand, there are obvious difficulties involved in the supposition that the two heroes met on the stage, since it is abundantly clear that Troy was represented as the scene of the action.

207

Τηλέ[] νμην γένο[ φου δάκνυ[ι τρ[όπον κακο[
] τί τοῦτο; ν[
]
] εγω
] ρα
.
.
.
.
5

207. 4 τούτι supra scr. pap.²

207 It is uncertain whether this fragment does not rather belong to the Ichneutes. The variant τούτι (cr. n.) enhances the doubt. In v. 2 φου may be φευ, and in any case Τηλέφου is not certain.

208

- AΣ. αμε[
 φήμη γὰρ α[
 ET. ἐδεξάμην τ[
 κόραξ ἐπάδ[
 AΣ. ἄριστος, ὦ δύσ[τηνε 5
 κράζει θυλη[
 ET. τί δ' οὖν ὁ σῶς δ[
 ἔργον τί δειλο. [
 AΣ. ἀ[λ]λ' οὐ τι μὴ συλ[
 [φί]λων ἀκηδ[ή]ς. [
 [ἀλ]λ' ἦξ[10

208 Murray's view, that the speakers are Eurypylus and Astyoche, is probably correct, and his restorations in vv. 3—6 are attractive: Εὐρ. ἐδεξάμην τὸ ρηθέν· ὡς ἄριστος ὦν | κόραξ ἐπάδει μάντις... Ἄστ. ἄριστος, ὦ δύστηνε; δύσφημον μὲν αὖν | κράζει θυλήν Ἄρεος ὡς δολωλόντων. That Eurypylus protests against the arguments used to dissuade him from entering into the contest may be gathered from ἐδεξάμην τὸ ρηθέν, ἔργον δειλόν, κόραξ ἐπάδει on the one hand, and φήμη, κράζει, φίλων ἀκηδής on the other.

2 φήμη: a prophetic voice. This meaning is illustrated by Blaydes on Ar. Av. 720. Sometimes φήμη in the narrower sense of an oracular utterance seems to be distinguished from κληθών, — a casual speech to which a warning significance is attached (Eur. Hel. 820 n.).

3 ἐδεξάμην: El. 668.

4 κόραξ. Peculiar importance was attached by diviners to the utterances of the raven, but his croak was not necessarily inauspicious. Cf. Aelian nat. an.

1. 48 ταῦτά ται καὶ μαντικοῖς συμβόλοις ἀγαθὸν ὁμολογοῦσι τὸν αὐτὸν (sc. κόρακα), καὶ ὀπτεύονται γε πρὸς τὴν ἐκείνου βοήν οἱ συνιέντες ὀρνίθων καὶ ἔδρας καὶ κλαγγὰς καὶ πτήσεις αὐτῶν ἢ κατὰ λαϊὰν χεῖρα ἢ κατὰ δεξιάν.—ἐπάδει, accipit. Here apparently of an encouraging or victorious strain, as in Eur. El. 864.

5 f. In the conjunction of κόραξ with θυλή Wilamowitz found an allusion to the rapacity of the raven, which would filch the offerings from the altar. Cf. Aesch. Suppl. 759, schol. Ar. Nub. 52 Ἴωνος θύοντος κόρακα ἀρπάσαι κωλῆν. See however Murray's restoration quoted above.

9 οὐ τι μὴ: O. C. 450, Trach. 621.

10 ἀκηδής is an addition to the tragic vocabulary, but ἀκηδεῖν occurs in Ant. 414, Aesch. Prom. 524.

209 ]σδ[

 .[
]ησεφ[
]λη δα[
] γαῖα κ[

5

10

]ήγεθ' ὑμ[ κ[ονίας σ[ ]ειναμ[
]δουστ[
]υ παρα[ ]εικατη[ κ[ῆρυξ δ[ ἀγγ[έλλει μ[ ]πρ[ λ[
].[

209. 11 τ supra δ scr. pap.²

209 Hunt conjectured from v. 11 f. naries of the contest.
that this fragment dealt with the prelimi-

210

Col. i. ΑΓΓΕΛΟΣ

5

5

]σα[
]ην μεταιχ[μι
 [ἀκομπ' ἀλοιδόρητα δ]ιαβεβλημ[έν

210. 1 Τη]λεφο() adscr. pap.² et infra]s 5 π]ηναί in marg. adscr. pap.³
et infra θ]ηρασιμα() 6 ἀκομπ' ἀλοιδόρητα ex Plutarchi loco infra allato huc renocavi (ἀκομπ' ἀλοιδόρητά τε Badham: ἐκόμπασ' ἀλοιδόρητα codd.)

210. 8 f. See cr. nn. Plut. de colib.
iv. 10 p. 458 E καὶ τὸν Νεοπτόλεμον ὁ Σοφοκλῆς καὶ τὸν Εὐρύπυλον ὀπλίσας 'ἐκόμ-πας' ἀλοιδόρητα, φησί, 'ἐρρηξάτην... ὀπλων.' The verses are quoted by Plutarch as an instance of angry men refraining from the idle fury of words.

It is not obvious at first sight how the words taken from Plutarch can be satisfactorily combined with the vestiges of this column, although Wilamowitz identified χαλκῶν ὀπλων with the conclusion of Plutarch's citation. Hunt placed ἀκομπ' ἀλοιδόρητά τε after ὀπλων, but admitted the difficulty of joining it with the remaining traces of v. 10. Hence I was originally inclined to keep the old fragment separate from the new papyrus, relying on the fact that χαλκᾶ ὀπλα is not rare in tragedy (Eur. Suppl. 1152, Tro.

573, Phoen. 1359, I. A. 1260, Hypsip. fr.
1 col. ii 30). But this solution is excluded, when we consider that Plutarch's quotation must have come from the messenger's speech describing the duel; for that is clearly just the part of the play to which [έρρηξάτην ἐς κύκλα χ]αλκίων ὄπλων

σ. [θ]ατέρου.

10

10

9 ἔρρηξάτην ἐς κύκλα ex Plut. l. l. (Soph. fr. 768 N.²) huc referenda intellexit Wilamowitz (ἐς κρίμα Weil, fort. ἐς σκύλα)

this column of the papyrus belonged. Accordingly, since τε is not an essential part of Badham's restoration (for the asyndeton cf. Eur. Alc. 173 ἀκλαντος, ἀστένακτος), I have placed ἀκομ' ἀλοιδορήτα before διαβεβλημένοι, understanding: 'whose enmity is declared without vaunt or chiding,' διαβάλλω, which is very unsatisfactorily treated in the lexicons, is exactly our to set by the ears. The word does not occur in Hom. Aesch. Pind. or Bacchyl., and Herodotus is the first writer who uses it freely. In the following instances, which are confined to the passive, there is no question (I think) that διαβάλλεσθαι is simply inveniri or inimicum fieri: Eur. Hec. 863, Hclid. 422 (n.), Hdt. 1. 118, 5. 35, 97, 6. 64, Thuc. 8. 81, 83. The original meaning must have been to be placed opposite to (apart from), although our evidence only applies to an opposition which has passed into hostility. The dative of the person with whom the hostility has been contracted, is usually expressed; but, if ἀλλήλους was absent from the present passage, it was easily to be supplied from the context. It is unfortunate that the idea of speaking evil has become so closely associated with διαβάλλω. It has nothing whatever to do with the usage now under discussion, but has led the critics astray in several instances. Thus, in Eur. I. A. 1372 διαβληθῆς is perfectly sound: 'take care that you don't get into trouble with the army.' Similarly, Thuc. 4. 22 should not be rendered 'lest they should lose credit.' The case might be considerably strengthened from the orators, but here it must suffice to quote one of the early instances: Andoc. 2. 24 οὐδὲν οὖν ἐτι υπολείπεται δῶν ἂν μοι δικαίως διαβεβλήθῃς, 'there is no reason left entitling you to harbour resentment against me.' Wyttienbach's note on Plut. mor. 37 B still deserves attention.

So far as Plutarch's quotation is concerned, Badham's emendation brought light into darkness, but has not solved the whole riddle. 'έρρηξάτην must be intransitive: "dashed at the orbs of (each other's) bronze shields." [L. and S. render "broke through," comparing ῥῆξαι φάλαγγα &c.: but this will not serve.

Under κύκλος they explain κ. χ. δ. as "circles of armed men" (J.). The intransitive use of ῥήγνυμι, although in accordance with the general tendency affecting verbs of motion (fr. 941, 11, fr. 973, Eur. Hcl. 1325 n.), is not well attested, and the best parallel is perhaps Alc. 775 καθ' ἡμᾶς οὐποτ' ἐκρήξει μάχη, which Dobree was the first to explain. But it seems doubtful whether ῥῆξαι ἐς can signify dash at: it should rather mean burst into or rushed forth to, and neither of these meanings will fit κύκλα χ. δ. On the other hand, the circumstances seem to shew that the vv. describe the opening of the duel, and that κύκλα ὄπλων cannot mean 'groups of armed men,' κύκλα, which occurs nowhere in tragedy, if not here, is applied in Homer to a set of wheels (Monro, H. G. § 99); and it is unlikely that Sophocles would have employed it in a non-Homeric sense. I am forced to the conclusion that κύκλα at any rate is corrupt. So far as the sense goes, Weil's κρίμα is unexceptionable, but κρίσω would rather be expected, and the corruption is improbable. Still less attractive is Wecklein's ἐρρηξάτην κύβευμα. I propose σκύλα (εσκήλα passing to εσκήλα, giving to ἐς the sense of for (with a view to).—ἀλοιδορήτα is active, like many other verbals in -τος: cf. χαλκόπλακτος El. 484, πάνωντος ib. 851, πιστός O. C. 1031, αὐτόγρωντος Ant. 875 (with J.'s notes), and εὐλοιδόρητος, prone to abuse, in Plut. am. 13. p. 757 A, fr. 941, 9, fr. 967, fr. 52, fr. 349. These transitive verbals are discussed by C. E. Bishop in A. J. P. xiii 339 ff.

H. wrote (C. R. xvii 288): 'The natural meaning of κύκλα χαλκίων ὄπλων is "round shields," as ἀσπίδος κύκλος, κύκλα προσώπου, κύκλα παρείης [Nonnus]. Therefore I think we are reduced to two interpretations: (1) they broke the boasts (e.g. ἐκκομπαστά λουδορητά) of their enemies against their brazen shields; or (2) they dealt unavailing, unreviling blows (e.g. ἀκομ', ἀκόμπαστ', ἀνεκόμπαστ') upon their enemies' round brazen shields. In (2) there would be a play upon the phrase ῥῆξαι or ἀναρῆξαι φωνήν, blows and wounds, not vaunts, were all they uttered: in N. 8. 28 Pindar, contrasting Ajax, the man of acts

			πα] ἀνευ δορὸς λαίσμασιν ματι· ν πρὸς οὐραν[όν]
15] δ' ἐστενάζετο ο] ργάνων στένει π] ἄλλει χερὸς γματος φυγῶν ς δορὸς	15
20	ἔγχος] μέσον]. ιται πρόσω υρησας κάτω ὀμμ] ἄτων φάος Α] χιλλέως	20

20 ἔγχος v.l. ex alia editione depromptum adscr. pap.²

(ἀγλωσσον μὲν ἦτορ δ' ἄλκιμον), with Odysseus, the man of words, says of them ἡ μὲν ἀνόμειά γε δόρσιον ἐν θερμῷ χροῖ ἔλκεα ῥήξαν. To do that you have to break down the defence, δι' ἀσπίδος θείναι Eur. Heracl. 685, 737, fr. 282, 20: Theocr. 22. 193 πολλὰ μὲν ἐς σάκος εὐρύ καὶ ἱππόκομον τρυφάλειαν | Κάστωρ, πολλὰ δ' ἐνυξεν ἀκριβῆς ὀμμασι Λυγχεὺς | τοῖο σάκος.' He also suggested ἐρραζήτην.—Herwerden conjectured μεσομάλοις δόρη | ἐρραζήτην κύκλοις χ. δ., i.e. frigerunt hastas contra elytreos. Campbell proposed κύκλωμα (adding συννόμω χερὶ in the previous line) for ἐς κύκλα, thinking that Eurypylos and Neoptolemus met the reviling words of their enemies with blows that crashed through their shields.

H. points out that in the narrative of Quintus neither Eurypylos nor Neoptolemus refrain from arrogant boasting of their own prowess. 'In vi 384 after killing Nireus he vaunts over him, τῷ δ' ἀρ' ἐπ' Εὐρύπυλος μεγάλ' εἶχετο δηωθέντι.' 'κέισό νυν, having met a better man.' Then he wounds Machaon, rants in the same strain (413), καὶ εὐχόμενος μέγ' αὖτε· "α δὲ δειλ',...ὅς οὐτιδανός περ ἐὼν μέγ' ἀμείνων φωτι | ἄντα κίεσ'" κτέ., continues triumphing when he is dead, and wounds him again: in vii 479 he is repulsed by Neoptolemus and others, but vaingloriously threatens, 512—522 ὡς ἔφατ' ἀκράαντον ἰεὺς ἔπος, and these two then take the lead in fighting against one another; thus winning the congratulations of their several sides, Neoptolemus as another Achilles, Eurypylos as another Hector. In viii they meet, Eurypylos challenging, 138:

τίς πῶθεν εἰλήλουθας ἐναντίον ἄμμι μάχεσθαι;
ἡ σε πρὸς "Αἶδα Κῆρες ἀμείλικτοι φορέουσιν
οὐ γὰρ τίς μ' ὑπάλυξεν ἐν ἀργαλέῃ ὑσμίνῃ,
ἀλλὰ μοι ὄσσοι ἑναρτα λιλαιόμενοι μαχέσασθαι
δεῦρο κίον, πάντεσσι φόνον στονόεντ' ἐφέηκα

κτέ., and there is an heroic duel, 187 τοὶ δ' οὐκ ἀπέληγον ὁμοκλήης, | ἀλλὰ σφέας ἐδάϊζον ἐς ἀσπίδας, 198 μέγα δ' ἔβραχον ἀμφοτέρωθεν | θεινόμενα μελήρεσι τὰτ' ἀσπίδες, until Neoptolemus, having gained the victory, exults over his fallen foe, hardly more modest than the other, 210 τῷ δ' ἐπικαυχάδων μεγάλ' εἶχετο.'

11 ἀνευ δορὸς: fr. 941, 15.

14 πρὸς οὐρανόν, probably of cries reaching to heaven, as in Aesch. Theb. 429 (of Capaneus) θνητὸς ὢν ἐς οὐρανόν | πέμπει γερῶνά Τηρι κυμαίνοντ' ἔπη.

24 ff. The reference is to the spear of Achilles, which, as Hunt remarks, had healed Telephus, and now, in the hands of Neoptolemus, slew Eurypylos, Telephus' son. Cf. infra. fr. 211, 10—12.

25

]ους δ' ἰωμένη
Τῆλεφον λέγω.
[ἰ]άσατο.
]κ. νους ταχὺς

25

Col. ii. καθεῖλ' ἔσω τὰ [πλ]εῦρα[

ΑΣ. οἰοιοῦ.

30

διπλοῦς ἀνεστέναξ[α.....]ρα[....]

ΧΟ. πατρὸς[.....]

5

ραν· ἐπ[..... Πρία]μος ἴδε τέκνων.

ΑΣ. τρίτην δ' ἐπ' ἐμ[.....] ΧΟ. κ[αί] γὰρ οὖν προσάγ[α]γ' ὠδι[...]. ιγ[...]. ν διαίνεις, 35

ἐπεὶ κτησίων φρενῶν ἐξέδυσ.

ΑΣ. ὦ δαῖμον, ὦ δύσδαιμον, ὦ κείρας [ἐ]μέ.

10

ΧΟ. ἀγγοῦ προσεῖπας, οὐ γὰρ ἐκτὸς ἐστὼς

σύρει δὴ φύρδαν.

ΑΣ. ἐπισπάσει δίκαι με.

40

29 οσωτα[...]. ἦμρ pap.¹: ε supra ο et ε supra η add. pap.²

συμφορὰν coni. Hunt

34 τρίτην pap. | deest paragraphus

32 sq. μοῖραν vel

Hunt, ὦδ' ὦν' vel ὦ...δπου Wilamowitz | δ]ακρύ[is et infra σὺ γὰρ αὐτ' in marg. adscr. pap.²

39 φύρδαν ex φურταν factum pap.

φύρταν v.l. ex alia editione rettulit in marg. pap.²

32 πατρός: 'i.e. Telephus' (Hunt).

34 τρίτην apparently relates to διπλοῦς, but it is not clear whether Astyoche speaks of herself as successor in misfortune to Telephus and Eurypylos.—The line must be divided between the two speakers, although there is no paragraphus in the papyrus. The scribe usually allots a fresh line to a new speaker, but γὰρ οὖν must be joined to 35 l.

36 See cr. n. With Hunt's ὦδιν', we might continue ἦνπερ εὖ διαίνεις. It is worthy of note that on Aesch. Pers. 1039 δαίαιε πῆμα schol. M comments δάκρυε τὸ ἀτύχημα.

38 'Now that thy wits have strayed from their home.' The metaphor which treats φρένας as a material possession is hardly to be rendered exactly, but there is no reason for understanding κτησίων (with Murray) as 'covetous,' in reference to the golden vine. We should rather compare φρένας (νοῦν) κεκτῆσθαι in Eur. Hipp. 701, Or. 1204, fr. 909. So too εὐ-βουλίαι and ἀθάλας are called κτήματα in Ant. 1050, O. T. 549. Observe how the metaphor is enforced by the use of words expressing local separation, when mental perturbation is described: so φρενῶν ἐκ-στήναι (Eur. Or. 1021), ἐξεδρος (Hipp. 935) and many more. Add El. 1326 φρενῶν τητῶμενος, Tr. fr. adesp. 175 τῶν φρενῶν ἐξῆρ' ἄνω.

37 δαῖμον...δύσδαιμον: cf. Eur. I. T. 203 δύσδαιμον δαῖμον, and see nn. on Eur. Hel. 213, Phoen. 1047. δύσδαιμον is an adj., practically equivalent to 'cruel.' For κείρας cf. Aesch. Pers. 923.

38 f. ἀγγοῦ προσεῖπας, rendered by Hunt 'thou speakest face to face,' implies rather 'thy words are near the truth.' Cf. fr. 314, 301 νῦν ἐγγὺς ἔγνω. Ant. 933 θανάτου τοῦτ' ἐγγυτάτω | τοῦπος ἀφίεται. Aesch. Theb. 960 ἀχέων τολών τὰδ' ἐγγύθεν. Eur. Hipp. 1070 πρὸς ἥπαρ δακρυῶν τ' ἐγγὺς τόδε.—For σύρει cf. Plat. de lib. educ. 8 p. 5 F πόλεμος χειμάρρον δίκην πάντα σῦρων καὶ πάντα παραφέρων.

40 ἐπισπάσει...με: 'will catch me.' The metaphor is from a fisherman hauling in his line: see on fr. 141.

- XO. δίκαια ναί.
 ΑΣ. ἀλλ' ὡς τάχιστα ἄριστα.
 15 XO. ἐέ.
 τί φήσομεν, τί λέξομεν;
 ΑΣ. τίς οὐχὶ τοῦτον ἐν δίκῃ βαλεῖ κάρη; 45
 XO. δαίμων ἔχειρεν οὐ δίκῃ σε δαίμων.
 ΑΣ. ἡ κάμβεβᾶσι τὸν [ν]εκρὸν πρὸς τῷ κα[κ]ῷ
 20 γέλῳτ' ἔχ[ο]ντες ἀ[δρ]ὸν Ἀργεῖοι βία;
 ΑΓ. οὐκ ἐς τοσοῦτον ἦλθον ὥστ' ἐπεγγαν[ε]ῖν, ἐπεὶ πάλαισμα κοιν[ο]ν ἡγωνι[σ]μέ[ο]ι 50
 ἔκειν[τ]ο νεκροὶ τυ[τ]θὸν [ἀ]λλήλων ἀ[π]ο,

41 δικάει pap.

δικᾶ Hunt

Wilamowitz

ἡκισμένοσ in fine v. 52 coniecerat Hunt

42 ἡ ταχίστη ἀρίστη in marg. adscr. pap.²

47 κάμβεβᾶσι scripsi: καὶ βεβᾶσι pap.

48 ἀδρὸν scripsi, αὐτόν

51 sq. δάκη τὰς scripsi, δοκητός Hunt | cetera supplevi, nisi quod

42 ἡ ταχίστη ἀρίστη (cr. n.) was evidently proverbial, 'the sooner the better.'

46 δίκαια: see cr. n. Wilamowitz assumed the existence of a present δικᾶν, so that the meaning would be 'Fortune judges thee not.' But the antithesis so presented is far from being clear, and it is simpler to accept δίκῃ, Hunt objects that there is an inconsistency with 41, but, since δίκαια is there 'punishment,' the inconsistency is at most a verbal one. The rhetorical repetition of δαίμων is Sophoclean: cf. fr. 753 (n.).

47 f. See cr. nn. The messenger's reply shows that the purpose of Astyoche's question was not to enquire whether the Argives had departed. But the chief reason for doubting the integrity of βεβᾶσι is the difficulty of combining βία either with it or with γέλῳτ' ἔχοντες. The latter alternative would suggest ἀγέλαστα πρόσ-ωπα βιαζόμενοι sooner than 'laughing in another's despite.' On the other hand, ἐμβεβᾶσι...βία ('have trampled violently') is peculiarly appropriate to the context. Though a Greek might laugh at his enemy's misfortunes (Αἴ. 79), he would hesitate to spurn his corpse. Hence, in answer to Agamemnon's οὐ γὰρ θανόντι καὶ προσεμβῆναι σε χρή; Odysseus replies μὴ χαῖρ', Ἀτρεΐδῃ, κέρδεσιν τοῖς μὴ καλοῖς (Αἴ. 1348 f.). The proverbial επεμβαίνειν κειμένῳ is copiously illustrated by Blaydes on Ar. Nuθ. 550. For the simple verb cf. Menand. ποιν. 356 μὴ ὑμβαίνει δυστυχοῦντι· κοινὴ γὰρ τύχη. Observe how the position of Ἀργεῖοι, recurring to the verb, justifies that of βία.—The order of the words is against the connexion of αὐτόν with τὸν νεκρόν, and it must therefore be rejected. Mekler suggests αὐτόν, but I prefer ἀδρὸν, for which cf. Antiphan. fr. 144 (11 70 K.). ἀδρὸν γέλασαι 'to laugh loudly.' It is unnecessary to alter τὸν νεκρόν to τῷ νεκρῷ, for the accusative may well be governed by γέλῳτ' ἔχειν after the pattern of O.C. 223 δέος ἴσχετε μηδὲν δο' αὐδῶ (Jebb's n.) or Eur. Or. 1069 ἐν μομφᾷ ἔχω. Observe that we must not make νεκρόν the direct object of ἔχοντες with γέλῳτα as predicate: for (1) there is no evidence that γέλῳτ' ἔχειν τινα could be used for γέλῳτα ποιεῖσθαι (or τίθεσθαι) τινα = 'to make a mock of another'; (2) γέλῳτ' ἔχειν should follow the analogy of αἰσχύνην ἔχειν, οἰκτὸν ἔχειν, ὀργὴν ἔχειν, and many other Sophoclean examples collected by Ellendt, s.v. ἔχω p. 293 b, thus becoming merely a substitute for γέλῳτ'.—For πρὸς τῷ κακῷ, insult added to injury, cf. Eur. fr. 1063, 15 καὶ πρὸς κακοῖσι τοῦτο δὴ μέγας γέλωσ.

49 ἐπεγγανεῖν. The simple verb (χαρεῖν) occurs in Αἴ. 1227, but ἐγγανεῖν is exclusively comic = 'to put out the tongue at' (Starkie on Ar. Vesp. 343). Cf. fr. 314, 344.

51 τυτθόν, not elsewhere in Sophocles or Euripides. In Aeschylus the adjective occurs twice (Ag. 1606, fr. 337), and τυτθᾶ as adv. in Pers. 367.

25	ὁ μὲν δ[α]κη τόσ', ὁ δὲ [τὸ] πᾶν [ἀ]σ[χημόν]ως, [λ]ύμην Ἀχαιῶν δις τ[ό]σην ἡκισμέ[ν]ος. ὥς δ' ἔκ τε πλῆ[γών] καὶ κό[πων] κεκμηκ[ό]τα[s [αὐ]τοὺς δια[σ]τείχοντας εἶδομεν πύλα[s 55 [ἀν]ε[ί]ρρομ[εν]
Col. iii.	24 litterae]ς ἰδὼν
	" "	ν]εκροῦ
	26 "]ρ[.]νη[
	25 "]ηχ[.]ι γ[60
5	26 "]ανηρ[ 24 "]ω τροφ[ 22 "]ν ἡματι
]ω[..... ἀγ[κυρῶν ἐτι
	...κ[.].....]ερ[..... ἔ]ρρηξεν νότος. 65
10	{το]ιαῦτα πολλῶ[ν λυγρὸ]ν ἔρρ[ό]θει στόμα, {π]ολλὴ δὲ συνδῶν [πολ]λὰ δ' Ἰστρ[ι]ανίδων

54 sqq. supplevit Wilamowitz ex συνδῶν factum pap.

66 λυγρὸν supplevit Wilamowitz

67 συνδῶν

52 Neither δοκητός nor δικητός has any probability: certainly it is difficult to see how νεκρός δοκητός could mean 'a dead man who seemed to be still alive.' Hunt concluded that the two corpses were those of Eurypylos and one of his victims, perhaps Nireus or Machaon; and that is the only inference open to us in the circumstances. But in that case it should be observed that δ μὲν must be the Greek, and ὁ δὲ Eurypylos, although Hunt seems to be of the contrary opinion. —For δάκος cf. Pind. Pyth. 2. 53 φυγεῖν δάκος ἀδινὸν καταγορεύειν, but of course there the metaphor may be taken from a sting or a bite. It is, however, a fair inference from Aesch. Theb. 386 λόφοι δὲ κῶδων τ' οὐ δάκνουσ' ἀνερδορός, and Cho. 842 τῷ πρόσθεν ἐλκαίνοντι καὶ δεδηγμένῳ that δάκος could be used for a spear-wound. —The deictic use of τόσος ('just a few') is recognized by the schol. on Trach. 53 τόσον ἀπὸ τοῦ ὀλίγου. Cf. Hom. Σ 378 οὐ δ' ἦ τοι τόσσον μὲν ἔχον τέλος ('they were all but finished'). Σ 322 τοῦ δὲ καὶ ἄλλο τόσον μὲν ἔχεν χρῶς χάλκεα τεύχεα. Dem. 34. 24 τὸ δὲ σύμπαν κεφάλαιον γίγνεται τόσον καὶ τόσον. —τὸ πᾶν is adverbial as in El. 1009. Rossbach suggests τὸ πᾶν ἐφθαρμένος.

66 τοιαῦτα. The purport of the preceding words was perhaps, 'while Eury-pylos lived, our city was like a ship securely moored; but now a fierce gale has broken the cable.' Cf. Tr. fr. adesp. 379, 380. —λυγρὸν. Hunt suggests πικρὸν as an alternative: he points out that οἰκτρὸν would be too long for the gap.

67 ff. It was usual to wrap the corpse of a chieftain in fine linen. Cf. Hom. Σ 352 (of Patroclus) ἐν λεχεῖσσι δὲ θέντες ἐαυτῷ λιτὶ κάλυψαν | ἐς πῶδας ἐκ κεφαλῆς, καθύπερθε δὲ φάρεϊ λευκῷ. Ω 580 καὶ δ' ἔλιπον δύο φάρε' ἐννητῶν τε χιτῶνα, | ὅφρα νέκυν πυκάσας δολιχὸνδε φέρεσθαι. β 97 Penelope is weaving a φᾶρος as Λαέρτηϊ ἥρωι ταφῆιον. Changes of clothing were frequently provided, either at the funeral or subsequently: Eur. Or. 1436, Rhes. 960, Thuc. 3. 58, Tac. ann. 3. 2. For the use of linen see Studniczka, Beiträge, p. 83; Hermann-Blumner, p. 363. —Ἰστριανίδων ὕφη were costly robes. Two successive glosses of Hesychius (II p. 374) attest that Ἰστριανίδες and Ἰστρίδες were names given to the wrappings themselves (αἱ Σκυθικαὶ στολαὶ ... ἐσθῆτές τινες οὕτω λεγόμεναι). —Wilamowitz calls attention to the anachronism of introducing work from Istrian looms into the Iliad of Priam, seeing that Istros was a colony of Miletus. It should be observed that the corrector (see cr. n.) has placed a second accent over συνδῶν, with

ὑψη γυναικῶν ἀνδρὸς ἐρριπτ[ά]ζετο

νεκρῷ διδόντες ο[ὐδ] ἐν ὠφελ[ο]υμένῳ.

15 ὁ δ' ἀμφὶ πλευραῖς καὶ σφαγαῖσι [κ]είμενος, 70

πατ[ῆρ] μὲν οὐ, πατρῶα δ' ἐξαυδ[ῶ]ν ἔπη,

Πρί[αμος] ἔκλαιε τὸν τέκνων ὁμ[αί]μονα,

τὸν [π]αῖδα καὶ γέροντα καὶ νεαν[ία]ν, τὸν οὔτε Μυσὸν οὔτε Τηλέφον [κα]λῶν

20 ἀλλ' ὡς φυτεύσας αὐτὸς ἐκκαλούμ[εν]ος. 75

οἶμοι, τέκνον, προύδωκά σ' ἐσχάτη[ν] ἔ[χ]ων

Φρυξὶν μεγίστην <τ'> ἐλπίδων σωτ[η]ρία[ν].

χρόνον ξενωθείς οὐ μακρὸν π[ο]λῶν [καλῶν]

Post v. 68 lacunam notavi
Wilamowitz | τ' addidi

76 προύδωκας Wilamowitz

77 μεγίστων coni.

78 καλῶν supplevi: ἐτῶν et postea δ' ἐτῶν Wilamowitz

the intention of substituting Σινδῶν (Σινδοί was the name of a Pontic tribe) for συνδῶν. But πολλή shows that συνδῶν is right.—The text can hardly be defended as it stands, although Hunt supports ἀνδρὸς ἐρριπτάζετο in the sense of 'were cast upon the man,' and thinks that the grammatical irregularity of διδόντες is parallel to Ant. 259 f. and other similar examples. But the genitive suggests an indignity, as if the wrappings were hurled at Eurypylus, and the harshness of this particular anacoluthon is due to the fact that the logical subject with which διδόντες ought to agree is not expressed or even indicated in the two preceding lines: contrast the examples in Kuehner-Gerth § 493. Ant. l.c., as a case of distributive apposition, is much easier. Wilamowitz regards 69 as an interpolation; but, as this only in part removes the difficulty, I should prefer to suppose that a line has been lost after ἐρριπτάζετο such as γέρας θανόντος, οἶα προσέφερον (Eur. Hel. 1262) Φρύγες. This is better than to read διδόντες and understand ἀνδρὸς of Priam, as I formerly suggested, although the apparent contrast of γυναικῶν with ἀνδρὸς is somewhat artificial.—The thought that the dead receive no benefit from funeral offerings is a commonplace. Cf. Aesch. fr. 266. Eur. Hel. 1421 τὰ τῶν θανόντων οὐδέν, ἀλλ' ἄλλως πόρος. Tro. 1248 δοκῶ δὲ τοῖς θανούσι διαφέρειν βραχύ, | εἰ πλουσιῶν τις τεύξεταί κτερισμάτων. fr. 640 ἀνθρώπων δὲ μαίνονται φρένες, | δαπάνας δταν θανούσι πέμπουσιν κνέας. Verg. Aen. 6. 213 ciniri ingrato suprema ferebant.

70 π. δ δ'...Πρίαμος: Eur. Hel. 1025, Phoen. 1128.—πλευραῖς καὶ σφαγαῖσι, 'his wounded side,' is a fair instance of hendiadys, for which see Lobeck on At. 145. Cf. Aesch. Eum. 247 πρὸς αἷμα καὶ σταλαγμὸν ἐκμαστέομεν. For σφαγαῖ in the concrete sense of 'wounds,' cf. Rhes. 790 θερμὸς δὲ κρουὸς δεσπότης παρὰ σφαγαῖς | βάλλει με.—πατρῶα...ἔπη resembles πατρῶων ὀρκίων in Trach. 1223.

73 would probably have been less obscure, if we had recovered the earlier part of the play. Since παῖδα, in contrast with γέροντα and νεανίαν, must, as Hunt has observed, mean 'boy' rather than 'son,' we may guess that Eurypylus was represented as βούπαις, ἀντίπαις—like Achilles in fr. 564—οἱ ἀνδρόπαις—like Troilus in fr. 619, and Parthenopaeus in Aesch. Theb. 520. Thus, the meaning would be: 'one who, while a boy in years, was both counsellor and warrior.' Cf. Eur. fr. 508, Paroen. 1 436. The topic of the virtues characteristic of the various ages has recently been handled by F. M. Cornford in Class. Q. vi 252 ff., and it is of course possible that παῖς covers an allusion to σωφροσύνη. For νεανίας = iuuenis Wilamowitz quotes Hdt. 7. 99. Cf. fr. 314, 357 n.

75 ἐκκαλούμενος seems to mean 'invoking,' as contrasted with καλῶν in the previous line. The meaning is the same in Trach. 1206, where a subordinate infinitive is added: οἶά μ' ἐκκαλεῖ, πάτερ, | φονεῖα γενέσθαι καὶ παλαμαίων σθένος.

76 π. See cr. n. In his smaller edition Hunt adopted Wilamowitz's πρὸ-

25 μνήμην παρέξεις τοῖς λ[ελειμμέν]οις Ἄ[ρεως, ὅς' οὔτε Μέμν[ω]ν οὔτε Σα[ρπηδών] ποτε 80
 π[έν]θη π[ο]ήσ[α]ς κ[αί]περ αἰχ[μητῶν] ἄκροι πόλλ' ἤ[μιν] ο[ ὥς ἐσχα[.] κ[ [ἐ]πεὶ δὲ ν[
 [πο]λλοῖσι[85

79 λελειμμένοις supplevit Wilamowitz, "Ἀρεως Hunt 80 sq. supplevit Wilamowitz δωκας, which requires that the full stop after σωτηρίαν should be removed and that δ' should be introduced after πολλῶν. πρόδωκας, 'thou hast abandoned us' (cf. Eur. Hipp. 1454 etc.), would be good enough; but the words ἔχων ἐλπίδων σωτηρίαν are somewhat more suitable to Priam than to Eurypylus, and the clause χρόνον...μακρόν should certainly qualify μνήμην παρέξεις, whereas in the revised text it must be attached to πρόδωκας...σωτηρίαν, with which it has no logical connexion. For these reasons I retain πρόδωκά σ', which has the support of the papyrus, and, since Ἀνί. 1166 would not justify the rendering 'I have lost you,' Priam must be supposed to reproach himself with having betrayed Eurypylus by inviting him to Troy.—ἐλπίδων σωτηρίαν is exactly like ἐλπίδων ἀρωγαί, which is applied to Orestes in El. 858. Since τε easily drops out—an error which may be illustrated from the same passage—we should probably read μεγίστην τ' here.—καλῶν is supported by frs. 81, 102, 592, 938.

211

AΣ. -μίδας καὶ τὸ[ν
 Ἰδαῖον βασιλ[ῆ]α Πρίαμον, ὃς μ[ πάσῃ καταρ[ ἔπεισεν ἄβου[λί]α 5
 ἔ[ργο]ν ἔρξαι. [
 XO. μναμοσ[ύ]ναν
 προλι[πῶν οὔποτ[
 AΣ. ἰὼ δόρυ Τηλ[εφ 10
 παιδὶ συνκ[ύ]ρσαν
 ὦ λόγχα σῶπ[ε]ρα [.] ομουσαμ[
 [.][

211 The divisions between the speakers, marked by the coronis in the papyrus, are given according to Hunt's text. Wilamowitz, however, attributes the whole fragment to the chorus.

1 -μίδας is doubtless, as Wilamowitz suggested, the end of Πριαμίδας.

4 Perhaps κατάπαρον. Astyoche reproaches herself for yielding to the bribe of the golden vine.

7 ff. Hunt well suggests that these lines contained a thought similar to that of fr. 210, 78 f. Cf. fr. 212, 4.

12 σώτῆρα: cf. fr. 210, 24.

212

οὐ]χὶ τεύχ[εσι
]σαι Διὸς
] . . [.]s εὐτ[υχ]εῖ θανών·
 πα]γκάλως δ' [ἀ]πώλετο
]σι θε[σ]μὸν ἰδρῦσθαι τὸ νῦ[ν] 5
] κοινόθακα λάξοα
 Τη]λέφου ξυνουσίαν
 δ]εῖπνα πλησιαίτατος
]ι τῶδε, μὴ δ' ἄνω []
]τι τικτούση τε[.] . [] 10
 τί]θ[η]σιν· ο[ὐ] π[α]ρος []
] ὀρφανὴ προσηδ[]
]δροπον πλόκον []
 XO.]πε[. . .]ναλ-
]ειν[. . .]αν 15
]νον

212. 6 κοινόθακα is a new compound, and λάξος was hitherto known only in the active sense (Timon fr. 25 Diels). 'The allusion seems to be to the tomb of Eurypylus' (Hunt). We may perhaps further infer that the body of Eurypylus was to be buried in an ancestral rock-tomb, where Telephus already lay.

18 δροπον is probably the remnant of a passive compound such as νεόδροπον. The words seem to have described a chaplet of flowers: cf. Eur. El. 778 δρέπων τερπίνης μυρσίνης κάρα πλόκους.

213

AΣ. . []
]έσο[]
]εσσ[]
]έστ[]
 απα 5
 δρᾶμ[.]s ἐν ἄλλο[ις]
 κἀγὼ φυλάξω π[] ἕως ἂν εὖ κρύψῃ[τε]
 XO. ἔρξω τὸ πα[]

213 laciniis columnae prioris omisi

213. 8 The iota is written in the papyrus, so that, unless there was an error, κρύψῃτε was not the original.

] θανὼν ἅπαν [10
] σεν Μυσᾷ βα[
] μέγαν δωμα[
] ἄρρυθ[μ
] καὶ παλ[
] ἦμιν· [

7 μυσᾷ ex μυσας corr. pap.²

217

· · ·
] λοτῇ[
] ο μυρίων [5
] τὸ φῶς ἐρ[
] μοι προσέ[ σ] υναλγους[
] σαισε[
 · · ·

217. 5 συναλγεῖν occurs in Ai. 253, 283.

218

· · ·
]
] ἐσχαρῶν [5
 θ] ανων
] ι πότμος·
] λέγ[
] δ[
 · · ·

218 After this fragment several small pieces of papyrus, containing here and there a complete word in addition to other vestiges, but for the most part only portions of words, are transcribed in Ox. Pap. IX 101—114, and numbered frs. 16—46, 48—82, 84—90, 92, 93, 95—

107. Those who desire to examine them will naturally consult the editio princeps. Inasmuch as they contribute nothing to our knowledge of the play, and the words which are legible are of slight interest as illustrating the vocabulary of Sophocles, it has been thought better to omit them.

219

. . .
 . . .] πα[
 . . .] χενος[
 . . .] ιτ' ἀντίων [
 . . .] πρᾶξιν ἐμ[
 . . .] . ας νῦν ἀνα . [5
 . . .] ι πρᾶξις ἦδε . [
 . . .] ι Ζεὺς γὰρ ὁ[
 . . .] ν ἀλλὰ καὶ [
 . . .] ι χρῆμ' ο[
 . . .] . . [10

219 2 αὐχένος or οὐχ ἐνός?

elsewhere so used by Soph.

3 ἀντίων, perhaps of foes, though not

220

. . .
 . . .] . [
 . . .] ντων λ . [
 . . .] ξένοι δυσήκοα [

220 δυσήκοα, probably in the same sense as ἀνήκουστα in El. 1407, 'terrible to hear.' The passive meaning is vouched by Pollux 2. 117 φωνήν...δυσήκοον.

221

. . .
 . . .] . νν αι[
 . . .] βλεμμ[α
 . . .] τος γὰρ ασ[
 . . .] αλ' εἰ' ἐπειγέ· [5
 . . .] εἶσ . . εἰνο[

221 The earlier lines seem to be iambs, and, if that is so, the trochaics in v. 21 f. must have been placed nearer to the left margin. No certain inference can be drawn as to the situation. In v. 12 Astyoche seems to be addressed. Wilamowitz suggested that Agamemnon was waiting in the distance (v. 22) for the return of a spy who had just departed from Troy (v. 13).

4 ἐπειγέ. For the intransitive use of the active imperative see on Eur. Helid. 732, Phoen. 1280. Cf. Soph. El. 1435. Hesych. II p. 139 ἐπειγέ· πορεύου, σπεύδε.

- (B) δρ]άσω τάδ' ω[
]as μέλαθρα ν[ (Xo.)]να κινεῖσθαι τ[ έν] χρόνῳ μάλι[στα
ο]ύχ' ὁρῶ· βέβηκ[ε δ]ωμάτων ἄγχι προ[
ἀνδ]ρὸς γύναι λαγέτ[α]
φρ]οῦδος ἐσθ' ὁ ξένος
]. μ' Ἀχαιοῖσιν αἰσιωτ[ατ
]. η τέτραπται του[
]ζων ὑπ' ἄτῃ τηλ[
]α μὴ σὺν κακῶ φθε[ιρ
]ονοπληξ εὔνις ἀτί[ σ]κηπτὸς ὦρα πόνω
]ξ[.]η θανῶν ἄζεται κατ[
οὐδ]αμῶς ἔχοιμ' ἂν εἰπεῖν τ[ ὡς] ἀναξ ἀνδρῶν Ἀτρεΐδης[ς
]. σοι τηλοῦ δοκάζει τη[
]μοση βαθεια[
]ασ . . [.]πα . [

221. 8 κινεῖσθαι pap.

22 ὡς supplevit Wilamowitz

18 The ed. pr. gave ον ἐπληξ', but ε is said to be unsatisfactory, and the neighbourhood of εὔνις does not favour the verb. A compound with -πληξ would be preferable, but, since ο is certain before ν, I can suggest nothing better than δαυμονοπληξ, for which cf. δαίμονος πληγή (fr. 961 n.), Aesch. Ag. 1660 δαίμονος χρήλῃ βαρεία δυστυχῶς πεπληγμένοι.

20 ἄζεται is more likely than ἀζεται in a tragic text, although Hunt thinks that the latter might have been applied to a corpse exposed to the sun. [By an oversight the words are inverted in the ed. pr.]

28 δοκάζει, a rare word, explained by Hesych. i p. 526 as equivalent to μένει, ἐπιτηρεῖ, δοκεῖ, προσδοκᾷ, is quoted from Sophron fr. 52 K. πλόον δοκάζων.

222

]. [.]τα δράσε[τε
] ἀλλὰ ταῦτ' ἐγώ . [
] εὔρον οὐδεπώποτ[ε
]ταν παῦλα καὶ κακῶν [

222 appears to contain reflections on the instability of human fortune. Wilamowitz restored ταῦτ' ἐγώ π[άλαι | τὰ θνήτ' ἀθήσας] εὔρον· οὐδεπώποτε | [ἡμῶν γένει]τ' ἂν παῦλα καὶ κακῶν [λόσις | τῶν

γάρ με]γίστων ἢ τύχη μεθίσταται | φρονη- μάτῳ | τάχιστα τοῦ λόγου [δὲ τὰν | τὸ πιστὸν εἰ]δείμεν, εἰ θρασὺν τ[ίνα]. In v. 5 Hunt thinks πλείστον more suitable than μεγίστων to the traces in the papyrus.

] . ιστων ἡ τύχη μεθίσ[ταται 5
] ν τάχιστα· τοῦ λόγου [
] ι δ' εἶημεν εἰ θρασὺν τ[
] τῆς τύχης ἀναστατ[
] νημερ[. . .] ζετα[ι

7 εἶημεν (or εἰδείημεν) is clearly indicated, although the shorter forms are normal in Attic, as metre shows. But Rutherford's rigid ostracism (Neu Phryn. p. 455) of the longer forms in the plural is not justified by the evidence. The three instances in Euripides (Cycl. 132 δρώμεν, Hel. 1010 ἀδικοῖμεν, Ion 943 φαίημεν) have not been convincingly emended, and δοίησαν seems certain in Damoxenus fr. 2, 67 (Athen. 103 B).

8 τῆς τύχης was perhaps governed by ἀνάστατον (?). Cf. Tr. fr. adesp. 394 πτωχὸν γενέσθαι καὶ δόμων ἀνάστατον. 'Cast from his high estate.'

ΕΥΡΥΣΑΚΗΣ

Welcker (p. 197 ff.) proposed to reconstruct the plot of the Eurysaces from Justin 44. 3 Gallaeci Graecam sibi originem asserunt: siquidem post finem Troiani belli Teucrum morte Aiakis fratris invisum patri Telamoni cum non reciperetur, in regnum Cyprum concessisse atque ibi urbem nomine antiquae patriae Salaminam condidisse. inde, accepta opinione paternae mortis, patriam repetisse. sed, cum ab Eurysace Aiakis filio accessu prohiberetur, Hispaniae littoribus appulsum loca ubi nunc est Carthago nova occupasse; inde Gallaciam transisse et positis sedibus genti nomen dedisse. It is of course unlikely that Sophocles knew of Teucer's settlement in Spain, for which Strabo (p. 157) is our earliest authority; but Welcker uses the fragments of Accius' Eurysaces, which was probably adapted from Sophocles, in order to fill the gaps in Justin's account. He is not however successful in establishing that the story was capable of such dramatic development as his theory requires. No answer is given to the question: why did Eurysaces refuse to receive Teucer, who rather deserved his gratitude¹?

The fragments of Accius are in themselves so inconclusive that Ribbeck (Röm. Trag. 419 ff.) is able to give them quite a different application. According to him, Telamon in his old age had been driven out of Salamis, and was discovered by Teucer and Eurysaces living miserably in Aegina. By their help and that of the citizens he was restored to his rights.

¹ Ahrens, who accepts Welcker's view, thinks that the ἀπολογία of Teucer referred to in Pausan. 1. 28. 12 may have been delivered on this occasion rather than at his return from Troy. He also quotes Varro ling. Lat. 7. 3 Teucer Livii post annos xv a suis qui sit ignoratus, but admits that we cannot connect the statement with Sophocles.

Ribbeck's reconstruction of Accius rests upon an extremely fanciful and improbable interpretation of the famous passage in Cic. pro Sest. 120—123. The difficulties involved are well-known, and we do not possess the material necessary for their complete solution; but Madvig's admirable note, reproduced in Halm's edition (1845), shows the true way of escaping from the chief of them,—the apparent inconsistency of the words in eadem fabula (121) with the statement of the schol. Bob. that Aesopus imported a reference to contemporary politics into his performance in the Eurysaces of Accius. For it is certain that the quotations o pater and haec omnia vidi inflammari belong to the Andromache of Ennius. In view of the currency which Ribbeck's views have obtained, the following remarks may be added: (1) It is a desperate expedient to suggest that Aesopus interpolated into the Eurysaces a canticum from the Andromache in order to do honour to Cicero. (2) The reference to poetae in 123 and the quotation from the Brutus show that Cicero intended to recall more than one representation. (3) Since o pater in 121 is taken from a lament for Eetion, who was killed, it is plain that patrem pulsum in the following sentence applies only to the circumstances of Cicero, and not to the fate of his prototype. There is no ground therefore for inferring that the Eurysaces mentioned the exile of a father, and the reference to Tusc. 3. 39, which concerns the banishment of Telamon after the death of Phocus, is beside the mark. (4) The two quotations in 122 must be assigned to the Eurysaces, but there is nothing to prevent us from supposing that Teucer was the exile there mentioned towards whom the Greeks are charged with ingratitude. (5) There is no serious objection to Madvig's conclusion that the quotations in 120 and the beginning of 121 are taken from the Andromache, and refer to a Greek hero whose identity cannot be ascertained.

Pseudo-Serv. on Verg. Aen. 1. 619 points in another direction: according to him, Teucer and Eurysaces returned from Troy in different ships; and, as Teucer arrived first without Eurysaces, Telamon, believing that his grandson was lost, refused to receive Teucer.

It is at least in favour of Welcker's view that the events which he introduces were subsequent to the withdrawal of Teucer to Cyprus. It does not seem probable that in this play Sophocles gave a different account of the home-coming of Teucer, with or without Eurysaces, from that which he made famous in the Teucer.

223

ἀδόξαστον

223 Hesych. I p. 47 ἀδόξαστον· ἀνέλπιστον. Σοφοκλῆς Εὐρυσάκει (εὐρυσά cod.). To the same effect Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 23, 8=Bekk. anecd. p. 344, 28, where the name of the play is omitted (=Phryn. fr. 80 de B.).

Cf. ἀδοξα fr. 71 (n.). Later ἀδόξαστος became a philosophical word, being employed to express the certainty of knowledge as contrasted with the untrustworthiness of opinion: in this sense the Stoic wise man was ἀδόξαστος (Diog. L. 7. 162).

ΗΡΑΚΛΗΣ

ΕΠΙ ΤΑΙΝΑΡΩΙ ΣΑΤΥΡΟΙ

ΗΡΑΚΛΕΙΣΚΟΣ

Of the eleven fragments collected under these titles three are cited from Ἡρακλῆς (with or without σατυρικός), two from Ἐπιταινάριοι, three from ἐπὶ Ταυνάρῳ (alone or with σατυρικός or σάτυροι), and two from Ἡρακλείσκος. I have added the solitary reference to the Cerberus, which, in view of the subject of the Heracles at Taenarum, can hardly belong to any other play. Now, Heracles was a very common character in satyr-plays, as Welcker (p. 319) showed, although it is generally believed that the Heracles of Euripides was the earliest treatment of his story as a subject for the tragic stage¹. It is quite possible, therefore, that Sophocles wrote more than one satyr-play of which Heracles was the hero; and, since the proper reference of Ἡρακλείσκος is to the infant Heracles (see on Διονυσίσκος, p. 117), I agree with Wilamowitz² in thinking that the play known by that title did not contain the descent at Taenarum, but more probably the legend related in the twenty-fourth idyll of Theocritus and the first Nemean ode of Pindar. On the other hand, the prevalent opinion that the Heracles is to be identified with ἐπὶ Ταυνάρῳ σάτυροι—for that is the most correct of the variants—may very well be right. It is, however, more in accordance with analogy to regard Ἡρακλῆς ἢ ἐπὶ Ταυνάρῳ

¹ See Wilamowitz, Eur. Herakles, I p. 98.

² Anal. Eur. p. 59 f. So also Décharme in Rev. Ét. gr. XII 2952. F. W. Schneidewin, who first published the Anthology of Orion, held that the two plays were distinct. Arguing against this conclusion, Wagner (Rh. Mus. VII 149) suggested that Ἡρακλείσκῳ was an error for Ἡρακλεῖ σκῶν (i.e. σατυρικός). For the form Ἡρακλείσκος: Ἡρακλῆσκος see Lobeck, Path. El. I p. 252.

σάτυροι as alternative titles adopted by the grammarians, than (with Nauck) to speak of Ἡρακλῆς ἐπὶ Ταινάρῳ σατυρικός.

Taenarum was situated at the southern point of the promontory which lay to the west of the gulf of Laconia; and a cavern close to the sea-shore was the legendary scene of the final labour of Heracles, his descent into Hades to carry off Cerberus from the under-world. This famous story was known to Homer (© 367, λ 623), who, however, does not mention the name Cerberus; but whether it was in the execution of this task that Heracles is said to have fought with Hades at Pylos (E 395) is by no means certain. Taenarum is mentioned as the entrance to the under-world through which Heracles descended by Eur. Her. 23 and Apollod. 2. 123. The incidents of the adventure are most fully described by the latter (122—126), but we have no means of connecting Sophocles with any of the particulars. It should, however, be noticed that Heracles is said to have returned by way of Troezen (Apollod. 126, Pausan. 2. 31. 2: cf. Eur. Her. 615)—probably in consequence of the rescue of Theseus having been effected on the same occasion. But the conditions of the satyr-play seem to require that the successful issue of the labour should be declared by the re-appearance of Heracles with Cerberus¹; and it is therefore satisfactory to find evidence of a tradition which brought him back to Taenarum (Pausan. 3. 25. 5).

From Eustath. Il. p. 297, 37 ἐν γοῦν τοῖς Ἡρωδιανοῦ εἴρηται ὅτι Εἰλωτες οἱ ἐπὶ Ταινάρῳ σάτυροι Nauck and Dindorf drew the inference that the chorus in this play consisted of Helots. This is an error, as has been pointed out by Décharme², Crusius³, and Wecklein⁴: the intention of Herodian was to state that the satyrs described themselves as Helots, and served in that capacity, just as in the Cyclops they were δούλοι of Polyphemus, and in other plays appeared as smiths (Σφυροκόποι), reapers (Θερισταί), and acolytes (Κήρυκες). See also p. 71.

Nauck refers to the opinion of W. Hippenstiel (de Gr. trag. princ. fab. nom. diss. Marburg. 1887, p. 17) that the play was produced in the last few years of Sophocles' life, but does not explain his reasons.

¹ Wagner thought that the whole action of the play was subsequent to the return of Heracles.

² Rev. Ét. gr. xii (1899) 296.

³ Paroemiographica, München, 1910, p. 100.

⁴ Telephomythus, München, 1909, p. 6.

224

ἀλλ' οἱ θανόντες ψυχαγωγοῦνται μόνοι.

224 ἀπλοὶ codd.: corr. Rabe

224 Schol. π in Aphthon. ed. Rabe (Rh. Mus. LXI 570) ἐν Κερβέρῳ δὲ Σοφοκλῆς ἄλλως τῇ λέξει (sc. ψυχαγωγεῖν) ἐχρήσατο· φησὶ γὰρ 'ἀλλ' οἱ (so Rabe for ἀπλοὶ codd.)...μόνοι.' ἐπὶ γὰρ τῶν διαπορθνευομένων ὑπὸ τοῦ Χάρωνος ψυχῶν λέγεται. The scholium on ψυχαγωγεῖν appears in a much shorter form in Doxapatries (Rhet. Gr. II p. 347 Walz, II p. 304 Sp.).

I have very little doubt that Cerberus is not the title of a play hitherto unknown, but merely an alternative name for the Heracles at Taenarum, in which we know that the carrying off of Cerberus was a prominent incident. The words may have been spoken by Hermes (or Charon) in answer to a request of Heracles for guidance. Cf. Verg. Aen. 6. 391 corpora viva nefas Stygia vectare carina. | nec vero Alciden me sum laetatus euntem | accepisse lacu.

225

.. συνέλεγον τὰ ξύλ', ὥς ἐκκαυμάτων
μή μοι μεταξὺ προσδεήσειεν

225. 1 ἐκκαύματα Pollux 10. 110

225 Pollux 10. 110 προσθετέον δὲ τῷ μαγείρῳ καὶ ξύλα καύσιμα καὶ κληματίδας καὶ ἐκκαύματα, εἰπόντος Σοφοκλέους ἐν 'Ηρακλεῖ σατυρικῷ 'συνέλεγον...προσδεήσειεν.' id. 7. 110 φησὶ γὰρ δὲ τούτους λέγει ἡ ποιητικὴ φωνή (X 29)· ἐκκαύματα δὲ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν 'Ηρακλεῖ σατυρικῷ 'συνέλεγον τὰ ξύλ', ὥς ἐκκαυμάτων μή μοι δεήσειεν.'

Cf. Phil. 292 ff. εἰρ' εἶδ'...ξύλον τι θραύσαι. ἐκκαίειν τὰ πυρά occurs in Hdt. 4. 134, 135. Euripides uses ἐκκαυμα metaphorically (cf. ὑπέκκαυμα): fr. 1031 ἐκκαυμα τόλμης ἱκανόν ἐστι καὶ θράσους.—Bentley proposed προσδεήσει εἶεν, which is no improvement. Blaydes fills up the first line with <οἱ δὲ> συνέλεγον.

226

τρέφουσι κρήνης φύλακα χωρίτην ὄφιν.

226 στρέφουσι codd.: corr. Jacobs | φύλλα καὶ codd.: corr. Tyrwhitt

226 Steph. Byz. p. 699, 12 χωρά... ὅθεν τὸ χωρίτης...Σοφοκλῆς Αἰγυῖ...καὶ ἐν 'Ηρακλεῖ 'στρέφουσι...ὄφιν.' Jacobs (see cr. n.) pointed out that we should read ἐν 'Ηρακλεῖ σ. (i.e. σατυρικῷ) τρέφουσι.

For the word χωρίτης see on fr. 92, and cf. χωρίτης δράκων Aesch. fr. 123.—

A serpent guarded the fountain of Ares at Thebes (Pausan. 9. 10. 5); for the popular belief connecting serpents with springs see on fr. 362. We may conjecture that this fountain should be identified with the magic spring at Taenarum referred to by Pausan. 3. 25. 8.

227

κυκλώπιον τροχόν

227 Hesych. II p. 550 κύκλους καὶ τροχούς· τὰ τεῖχη. τροχόν δὲ τὸ τεῖχος, ὥς Σοφοκλῆς 'Ηρακλεῖ (ἡρακλέα cod.) 'κυκλώπιον τροχόν.'

So we might speak of the 'circuit of the walls': cf. Shakspeare King John II. 1. 259 'the round of your old-faced walls.' No similar instance of τροχός is quoted from literature and τοῖχοι is now read for τροχά in schol. Plat. legg. 681 A. Cf. Hesych. iv p. 181 τροχός· περιβόλαιον, τείχος. In Etym. M. p. 455, 52 θριγκῶ is explained τῷ τροχώματι, i.e. ὁ περιτρέχων κυκλόθεν ὅλον στέφανος.—Jebb on Bacchyl. 10. 57 points out that the legend of the Cyclopes as builders is post-Homeric. So far as I have observed, only the walls of Mycenae and Tiryns are mentioned as having been erected by them, although Argos as the name of the district is sometimes introduced (Eur. I. A. 534). See Willamowitz on Eur. Her. 15, 945. Here it may be assumed that Mycenae is referred to, as the home of Eurystheus: cf. Pind. fr. 169.

228

κρεῖσσον θεοῖς γὰρ ἢ βροτοῖς χάριν φέρειν.

228 Orion flor. 5. 9 p. 47, 24 ἐκ τοῦ Ἡρακλείσκου σατυρικοῦ. 'κρεῖσσον... φέρειν.' Dindorf, in agreement with Wagner (p. 107₂), held that Ἡρακλείσκου here and in the source of the next fr. was a corruption of Ἡρακλέους σατυρικοῦ. The same line without the mention of author or play is quoted in flor. Monac. 102, with θεῶ for θεοῖς.

χάρις, a favour once conferred, becomes a debt due from the recipient: At. 522

χάρις χάριν γὰρ ἔστιν ἢ τίκτουσ' αἰεὶ, Eur. Hel. 1234. And the gods may be trusted to fulfil their obligations, whereas you can never be sure of a man (Aesch. fr. 399, Soph. fr. 667).—χάριν φέρειν, like χάριν ἔχειν, is ambiguous in itself, and may mean to get a boon, as in O. T. 764. Hence there must be some doubt as to the exact force of O. C. 779 δὲ οὐδὲν ἢ χάρις χάριν φέροι.

229

τὸν δρῶντα γάρ τι καὶ παθεῖν ὀφείλεται.

229 τῷ δρῶντι coni. Blaydes | γάρ Orion: πού schol. Pind.

229 Orion flor. 6. 6 p. 49, 13 ἐκ τοῦ Ἡρακλείσκου Σοφοκλέους. 'τὸν δρῶντα... ὀφείλεται.' Schol. Pind. Nem. 4. 51 παρὰ τοῦτο ὁ τραγικός 'τὸν δρῶντά πού τι καὶ παθεῖν ὀφείλεται.' Aelian apud. 6. 13. 5 καὶ τι καὶ λαμβεῖον ἐπειπεῖν 'τὸν δὲ νοῦν εἶναι τοῦ λαμβεῖον, ὅτι τῷ τι δρῶντι καὶ παθεῖν ἔστω ὀφειλόμενον. A very similar line is attributed to Aeschylus (fr. 456) by Stob. eccl. 1. 3. 24 p. 56, 22 W. and Theoph. ad Autol. 2. 37: δρᾶσαντι γάρ τοι καὶ παθεῖν ὀφείλεται. It is not unlikely that the ascription to Aeschylus is due to recollection of and confusion with Cho. 312 δρᾶσαντι παθεῖν, τριγέρων μῦθος τὰδε φωνεῖ.

The oldest statement of the primitive lex talionis in Greek appears to be the line (sometimes ascribed to Hesiod) which Arist. eth. N. 5. 5. 1132^b 25 calls τὸ Ῥαδάμανθους δίκαιον: εἰ κε πάσαι τὰ τ' ἐρεξε δίκη κ' ἰδέα γένοιτο. To the passages cited above add Aesch. Ag. 1562 μῖμνει δὲ μῖμνοντος ἐν θρόνῳ Διὸς | παθεῖν τὸν ἐρξάντα, Soph. Ant. 927 μὴ πλείω κακὰ | πάθοιεν ἢ καὶ δρῶσιν ἐκδικῶς ἐμέ, Antiph. fr. 58 Διὸς ὅστις δὲ δράσει μὲν οἴεται τοὺς πέλας κακῶς, πέσεισθαι δ' οὐ, οὐ σωφρονεῖ. See also fr. 962.

Blaydes has good cause for proposing τῷ δρῶντι, for which he quotes Eur. fr. 10, besides Aesch. fr. 456. He might have made his case much stronger, for the usage appears to be invariable: see Phil. 1421, El. 1173, Eur. Alc. 419, 782, Andr. 1271 f., Or. 1245, Lys. 25. 11. In other words, ὀφείλεται does not seem to have become impersonal, like πρέπει, προσήκει, and the rest. For the shifting usage of these verbs see Kuehner-Gerth II 27, and it is of course arguable that ὀφείλεται here may have suffered extension after their analogy.

230

τοιγὰρ ἰωδὴ φυλάξαι χοῖρον ὥστε δεσμίαν

230 χοῖρον...δεσμίαν Casaubon: χοῖρος...δεσμίαν AC

230 Athen. 375 D χοῖρον δ' οἱ Ἴωνες καλοῦσι τὴν θήλειαν, ὡς Ἰππῶναξ...καὶ Σοφοκλῆς Ἐπιταυναῖος. 'τοιγὰρ...δεσμίαν.'

This fragment has not yet been successfully restored, but Casaubon's χοῖρον ὥστε δεσμίαν is made all but certain by the schol. on Ar. Lys. 1073, which Headlam cited: τὸ δὲ χοιροκομῆον εἶκε πλεκτὸν ἀγγεῖον εἶναι, ἐν ᾧ τοὺς νέους ἔτρεφον χοῖρους περιδῆσαντες. νῦν δὲ λέγει τὸν πᾶνταλον, ἐν ᾧ δεσμεύουσι τοὺς χοῖρους καὶ τρέφουσιν. [The confusion in the note indicated by Rutherford does not affect the present question.] Further, most scholars have attempted to extract δέ from the opening words in order to provide a support for φυλάξαι, although we cannot feel sure that Athenaeus quoted a complete sentence. Casaubon edited τοιγαροῦν | ἔδει, which was adopted by Brunck in his edition of the Fragments.

Dindorf gave τοιγὰρ ἰὼ δέ, —an easy remedy, if it were possible to see any ground for connecting ἰὼ with this play. It is much more likely that Bergk was right in making Cerberus the object of φυλάξαι, but his reading τὸν γὰρ ἰωδὴ (venomous) is not altogether convincing, although the epithet might be supported by Hor. Carmin. 3. 11. 19 saniesque manet | ore trilingui, and more particularly by the rationalized version of Hecataeus (FHG 1 27) in Pausan. 3. 23. 4 ἀλλὰ Ἐκαταῖος μὲν ὁ Μελήσιοι λόγον εἴρεν εἰκότα, ὅφιν φήσας ἐπὶ Ταυνάρῳ τραφῆναι δειῶν, κληθῆναι δὲ Ἀἰδου κύνα, ὅτι ἔδει τὸν δηχθέντα τεθνάναι παραντίκα ὑπὸ τοῦ ἰοῦ· καὶ τοῦτον ἔφη τὸν ὅφιν ὑπὸ Ἡρακλέους ἀχθῆναι παρ' Εὐρυσθέα. H. conj. τῷ δέ φυλάξαι, ignoring τοιγὰρ, which he regarded as a marginal gloss. Herwerden preferred τί γάρ; | ὅν δέ φυλάξαι, and Blaydes τοιγὰρ αὐτὴν δέ.

231

ἄγανον ξύλον

231 Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 12, 12 ἄγανον· καλὸν, ἡδύ. Ἀριστοφάνης Λυσιστράτῃ (v. 885) 'ἐμοὶ γὰρ αὕτη καὶ νεωτέρα δοκεῖ | πολλῶ γεγενῆσθαι κάγανωτερον βλέπειν.' Σοφοκλῆς δὲ Ἐπὶ Ταυνάρῳ ἄγανον ἔφη ξύλον βαρυτόνος τὸ κατεαγός, ἢ τὸ ἀπελέκτον. Cf. Eustath. Il. p. 200, 1 ἐν δὲ ῥητορικῷ λεγικῷ (Ael. et Pausan. fr. 340 Schw.) γράφεται ταῦτα· ἄγανον· τὸ καλὸν καὶ ἡδύ καὶ προσηγνός. ποτὲ δὲ κατ' ἀντίφρασιν τὸ χαλεπὸν· ἐν ἑτέρῳ δέ, ὅτι ἔστι καὶ ἄγανον προπαροξιντόνος καὶ δηλοῖ τὸ κατεαγός· τραγικώτερον δέ, φησί, τὸ ὄνομα (=Cramer, anecd. Par. 111 p. 373, 32). Bekk. anecd. p. 335, 10 ἄγανον· τὸ κατεαγός. ἢ πρώτῃ ὁξείᾳ. καὶ τοῦτο τραγικώτερον τὸ ὄνομα (=Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 12, 10, Phryn. fr. 48 de B.).

Hesych. 1 p. 14 ἄγανον· τὸ κατεαγός ἀπὸ ἄλλου. Suid. s.v. ἄγανον. προπαροξιντόνος τὸ κατεαγός ξύλον, ἢ τὸ φρυγανώδες καὶ ἔτοιμον πρὸς τὸ κατεαγῆναι. οἱ δὲ τὸ ἀπελέκτον.

We infer that ἄγανον was particularly employed to describe fire-wood, and was perhaps used substantively like φρύγανον. Indeed, it is not quite clear whether ξύλον is quoted from Sophocles or is part of the explanation. The limitation of meaning distinguishes ἄγανος from ἐδανός, στεγανός, and κιθανός, which are all oxytone: cf. στέφανος, which was originally adjectival. For the breaking of wood to make a fire cf. Phil. 294 ξύλον τι θραύσαι. Note the coincidence with fr. 225.

232

ἀλαλίαν

232 Hesych. I p. 113 ἀλαλίαν· πονηρίαν, ἀταξίαν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἐπιταυαρίοις (ἐπὶ παινεάροις cod.: corr. Casaubon). Dindorf infers that this play was called Ἐπιταυαρίοι by the grammarians, who assumed that such was the name of the satyrs. Nauck quotes Cramer, anecd. Oxon. I p. 59, 8 ἐπὶ Ταυάρῳ Ἐπιταυαρίος.

L. and S. prudently omit this mysterious word, and Ellendt's remark 'dictum quasi κακολαλία' is not very helpful. One might guess that there is some confusion with ἀλαλά (or ἀλαλαί, ἀλαλαγὰ?), explained as πονηρία <καί> ἀταξία <τοῦ λαλεῖν>. ἀλαλή was a wild tumultuous cry: cf. Pind. fr. 208 μανίαι τ' ἀλαλαί τ' ὀρνομένων βίψαυ' ἔχει σὺν κλόνῳ. Eur. Phoen. 335. Now see Etym. M. p. 55, 48 ἀλαλή, ὁ θόρυβος καὶ ἡ ἀναρῆρος φωνή... καὶ ἀλαλητός, ὁ θόρυβος, παρὰ τὴν ἀλαλήν, ἥ κατὰ στέρησιν τοῦ λαλεῖν (i.e. inarticulate), ἥ κατ' ἐπίτασιν, οἷον ὁ πολὺλαλος ὄχλος. On the other hand, ἀλαλος seems to mean tumultuous rather than dumb in Plut. def. or. 51 p. 438 B.

233

ἀργέμων

233 Hesych. I p. 272 ἀργέμων· τῶν ἐν τοῖς ὀφθαλμοῖς λευκωμάτων· οἱ δὲ ὀφθαλμῶν (ὀφθαλμῶν cod.). Σοφοκλῆς ἐπὶ Ταυάρῳ σατυρικῶ. Cf. Etym. M. p. 135, 36 ἀργεμον, τὸ κατὰ πάθος γενόμενον λεύκωμα ἐν τῷ ὀφθαλμῷ· παρὰ τὸ ἀργὸν τὸ λευκόν. Erotian gloss. Hippocr. p. 47, 10. Eustath. Od. p. 1430, 60 attributes the explanation of the word to Didymus. Pollux 2. 65 has the form ἀργεμος (cf. Etym. Guā. p. 73, 6): ἀργεμος τὸ καλούμενον λεύκωμα, καὶ ὁ τοῦτ' ἔχων ἄνθρωπος ἐπάργεμος. It seems that ἀργεμος was the name of the disease, and ἀργεμον of the part affected; and, as Ellendt remarks, a doubt was raised to which of the two the word in Sophocles should be referred. The view taken by Didymus is to be preferred. Pollux 2. 146 says that the upper part of the nails was called ἀργεμοί. In Latin argema is used as a neut. sing.: see Thesaurus s.v. Albugo and Leucoma are still technical terms in modern medicine.

234

οὐ κωφεῖ

234 Phot. lex. p. 359, 25 οὐκ ὤφειεν· οὐ βλέπτει. Σοφοκλῆς ἐν ἐπὶ Ταυάρῳ (τεράρω cod.) σατύροις. The right reading was recovered from Hesych. III p. 237 οὐ κωφεῖ· οὐ βλέπτει, οὐ πηροῖ. Cf. II p. 566 κωφεῖ· κακουργεῖ, βλέπτει, κολουεῖ (κολυεῖ cod.), πηροῖ, with κωφητέος· βλαπτέος, and κώφης· κόλουσις.

Wagner and M. Schmidt suggested that the error of Photius might be explained by supposing Sophocles to have written οὐ κωφεῖ ξένον (or ξένους). H. thought that the original form of the entry might have been <οὐ κωφεῖ>· οὐ κωφίζει· οὐ βλέπτει.

The original meaning of κωφός was probably 'blunt, dull,' as in Hom. A 390 κωφὸν γὰρ βέλους ἀνδρὸς ἀνάγκη οὐτι-δανοίω. Cf. O. T. 290 κωφὰ καὶ παλαιὰ ἔπη. The common use for 'deaf' or 'dumb' was a special application, but the ancient grammarians, and even Porson on Eur. Or. 1279, reversed the history of the word. For the wider meaning of the verb cf. Anacr. fr. 81 αἱ δὲ μεν φρένες ἐκκεκωφέονται: Etym. M. p. 322, 22, quoting the passage, gives παραβεβλαμμέναι εἶσιν as a paraphrase.

ΗΡΙΓΟΝΗ

Besides that of Sophocles, we have a record of plays composed with this title by Phrynichus¹, Philocles, and Cleophon. Accius also wrote an Erigona, as we shall see. There is nothing in the three references to it in his brother's correspondence to show the character of the Erigona composed or translated by Q. Cicero (Cic. Q. fr. 3. 1, 6, 9).

Welcker (p. 215) identified this play with the *Aletes*² (see p. 62), on the ground that, inasmuch as Aletes and Erigone were brother and sister, the son and daughter of Aegisthus and Clytaemnestra, and Orestes was the opponent of both, a divided action is not to be thought of. There is nothing in the fragments ascribed to either title which assists or hinders the identification; but, though Welcker is probably right in his view of the Aletes, it by no means follows that the Erigone refers to the same series of events.

The name of Erigone was familiar to the Athenians in connexion with the curious festival known as αἰώρα (for which see the commentators on Verg. Georg. 2. 389), at which was sung the song known as ἀλῆτις. Several aetiological legends arose to account for the obsolete and unintelligible titles, of which we need only refer to two.

(1) In the first of these Erigone is still the daughter of Aegisthus, but she is brought to Athens as the accuser of Orestes before the Areopagus. The most explicit account is preserved in Etym. M. p. 42, 3 λέγεται γὰρ Ἡριγόνην τὴν Αἰγίσθου καὶ Κλυταιμνήστρας θυγατέρα, σὺν Τυνδάρει τῷ πάππῳ ἐλθεῖν Ἀθήνας, κατηγορήσουσαν Ὀρέστου· ἀπολυθέντα (? -ος) δέ, ἀναρτήσασαν ἐαυτὴν προστρόπαιον τοῖς Ἀθηναίοις γενέσθαι. κατὰ χρῆσμον δὲ ἐπ' αὐτῇ συντελεῖσθαι τὴν ἑορτήν. To the same effect is Marm. Par. FHG I 546, where Orestes is said to have been tried for the death of Aegisthus, and this no doubt accounts for the appearance of Erigone, his nearest surviving relative, as accuser. Cf. Dictys bell. Troi. 6. 4. In Apollod. epit. 6. 25 Orestes is said, according to different accounts, to have been brought to trial either by the Erinyes or by Tyndareus or by Erigone. Tyndareus doubtless appears in two of these passages as claiming retribution for the death of his daughter

¹ Probably not the pupil of Thespis: see Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 427.

² He assumed a double title Ἀλῆτις καὶ Ἡριγόνη (p. 69), but the parallels which he adduces are quite uncertain.

Clytaemnestra¹. According to others, Orestes married Erigone (Tzetz. Lycophr. 1374), and Cineaethon (fr. 4, EGF p. 197) mentioned Penthilus, their son.

(2) Another legend made Erigone the daughter of Icarius, by whom Dionysus was hospitably entertained, and to whom he gave a wine-skin, with instructions to spread abroad the knowledge of the newly bestowed blessing. Icarius, with his daughter Erigone and his dog Maera, came to Attica in the course of his mission, and freely bestowed his wine upon the rustics. The intoxicating results which followed convinced the shepherds that they had been poisoned, and they straightway cudgelled Icarius to death. The dog Maera by her howls guided Erigone to her father's unburied body; and Erigone, distraught with sorrow, hanged herself on a neighbouring tree. The punishment of heaven fell upon the guilty Athenians, who at length appeased the divine resentment by the institution of a festival (αἰώρα, oscilla) in honour of Erigone. See Hygin. fab. 130, Ov. Ibis 611 ff., Aelian nat. an. 7. 28, Nonn. Dionys. 47. 34—264. The literary sources of this story have not been traced to any earlier writer than Eratosthenes, who wrote an elegy entitled Erigone (E. Maass, Anal. Eratosth. p. 132). Ribbeck (Röm. Trag. p. 621) develops the view that the Erigone of Sophocles was the daughter of Icarius, correcting ἐν συμμυρίονῃ or συμμυρίονῃ the reading of the MSS in Erotian (fr. 236) to ἐν σατυρικῇ Ἠριγόνῃ. He points out that the reception of Dionysus with his chorus of satyrs by the Attic peasants offered suitable opportunities for comic episodes.

On the whole, though the evidence is insufficient to determine the contents of the Erigone, the balance of probability is against Welcker's identification. Against Ribbeck's view must be set the fact that the fragments of Accius' play undoubtedly relate to the story of Orestes, and he himself inclines to the identification of the Erigone with the Agamemnonidae. The frequent occurrence of the title suggests that it was suitable to a tragedy rather than to a satyr-play. Maass (op. cit. p. 133₁₁₅) adds that before Ribbeck's conjecture is approved we must satisfy ourselves that the Icarian Erigone was known as early as Sophocles².

¹ Wagner suggested that Tyndareus appeared in the character of the legal representative of Erigone, who could not have conducted the accusation in person owing to her juristic incapacity. On the other hand, if Aletes was adult, there was no reason for the introduction of Tyndareus into the Aletes, and consequently fr. 646 belonged rather to the Erigone.

² The same remark applies to Haigh's classification of the plays of Phrynichus, Philocles, and Cleophon (p. 477 ff.).

235

ἀ δὲ

δόξῃ τοπάζω, ταῦτ' ἰδεῖν σαφῶς θέλω.

235 Phot. lex. p. 595, 9 τοπάζειν·
οἷον στοχάζεσθαι, ἐνθυμείεσθαι, ὑπονοεῖν...
καὶ παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἡριγόνῃ 'ἀ δὲ... θέλω.' To the same effect Etyim. M.
p. 762, 13, and Suid. s.v. τοπάζειν. Cf.

Aesch. Ag. 1368 τὸ γὰρ τοπάζειν τοῦ σάφ' εἰδέναι διχα. Similarly Soph. Trach.
425 ταῦτό δ' οὐχί γίγνεται, | δόκησιν εἰπεῖν κάξακριβῶσαι λόγον.

236

νῦν δ' εἰρὴ ὑπαφρος ἐξ αὐτῶν ἔως ἀπώλεσέν τε καὶ τὸς ἐξαπώλετο.

236. 1 ὑποφρος codd.

236 Erotian. gloss. Hippocr. p. 128,
16 ὑποφρον (leg. ὑπαφρον)· κρυφαῖον, ὡς φῆσιν ὁ Ταραντῖνος (this refers to the authority of Heracleides of Tarentum, a distinguished medical writer belonging to the third or second century B.C., whose carefulness Galen specially commends). μαρτυρεῖ γὰρ ὁ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἡριγόνῃ (so Casaubon for συμμεγύνη: for Ribbeck's conj. see p. 174) λέγων 'νῦν δ'...ἐξαπώλετο.'
μέμνηται ὁ αὐτὸς καὶ ἐν Ἰφίγενείᾳ (fr. 312).
καὶ ὁ Ἱπποκράτης (de arte 10, VI 18 Littr.)
δὲ σαφὲς ποιεῖ λέγων 'οὐδὲν ὅτι καὶ ὑποφρον (οὐχ ὑπαφρον Hippocr.) καὶ ἔχον περὶ αὐτὸ θαλάμας.' The evidence of the MSS of Hippocrates, of the lexicographers, and of Euripides and his scholia is so strong in favour of the form ὑπαφρος that we can only consider ὑποφρος to be an error in all three places of Erotian. The next question concerns the meaning of the word which was obsolete and unfamiliar in Alexandrian times. It may be remarked that the authority of Erotian stands high in itself, and is here supported by the express testimony of Heracleides:
we conclude that the interpretation κρυφαῖον rests on the sound tradition of scholarly writers. As Sophocles is quoted for this meaning, some strong reason is required to justify any other interpretation. But the other evidence confirms Erotian: Phot. lex. p. 620, 19 and Hesych. IV p. 200 explain by ὑπουλον, κρύφον and μὴ φανερόν (μὴ om. Phot.); and the schol. on Eur. Rhes. 711 has ὑπαφρος ὁ μὴ φανερός, ἐκ μεταφορᾶς τῶν ὑπ' ἀφρόν νηχομένων, ἧ τῶν ὑφάλων πετρῶν, αἷς ἐπανθεῖ ἀφρός· ἧ ὁ καταπληκτικός, ὁ μανικός. The passage in Eur.

i.e. describes the entrance of Odysseus into Troy disguised as a beggar: *ἔβα καὶ
πᾶρος | κατὰ πόλιν ὑπαφρον ὄμμι' ἔχων | ῥακοδύτῳ στολῇ κτέ.* The following explanations have been given: (1) with the face of an idiot, (2) blear-eyed, rheumy, (3) tear-stained, (4) treacherous (or disguised?). The first three assume that the origin of the word is to be traced either to ἀφρός or to ἀφρός, and the only ancient evidence in their favour, apart from the scholium, is an alternative gloss in Hesychius: ὑγρασίαν ἔχον ἐμπερὴ ἀφρός. The balance is strongly on the side of the rendering κρυφαῖος, and there is nothing against it except that we do not know the history of the word.
Whether it has anything to do with ἀφρός, meaning, as J. suggests, 'having foam beneath' (cf. ὑπουλος), must remain uncertain. The restorations proposed, νῦν δ' ἦρις ἦν (Herwerden), νῦν δ' εἰρῆς ὑπαφρος (Ellendt), and συνῆψε δὲρην ὑπαφρον, ἐξ αὐτῶν ἔως (M. Schmidt), are not convincing. J. conjectured νῦν δ' εἰρῆς ἄρῃς ὑπαφρος, 'fermenting secretly'; but what is to be made of ἐξ αὐτῶν? Perhaps νῦν δ' εἰρῆς φῆρην ὑπαφρος ἐξ αὐτῶν, i.e.
insensibly their consciousness left them.
The scribe's eye passed from one ρ to the other, and the loss of ν was due to its being written above the line (Cobet, *Var.
Lect.* p. 530). R. Ellis (C. R. ix 105) thought that ὑποφρος was a mistake for ὑπόφορος (cf. ὑποφορά—a hollow passage);
but this view hardly gives sufficient weight to the evidence that ὑπαφρος existed with the meaning 'secret.' Headlam tentatively suggested ἴρις ὥς... ἐξ αὐγῶν (C. R. XIII 3). Blaydes: νῦν δ' ἐρις ὑπαφρος < ἦν τις οὐ ἐγένετο > ἐξ κτέ.

2 Headlam on Aesch. Ag. 352 οὐ τὰν ἐλόντες αὖθις ἀνθαλοῖεν ἄν quotes many similar phrases for 'the biter bit.' So fr.

774. Nauck, comparing Eur. Hel. 106, J. T. 715, was inclined to substitute ἀν-απώλετο for ἐξαπώλετο. ἐξαπώλετο, however, illustrates the Sophoclean tendency to use compounds with ἐξ, for which see on fr. 524, 4.

ΘΑΜΥΡΑΣ

The scene of the play was the neighbourhood of Mt Athos, as appears from fr. 237. For the connexion of Thamyras with this district cf. Eustath. Il. p. 299, 5 καὶ ὅτι ἐν τῇ Ἀκτῇ τῇ περὶ τὸν Ἄθων Θάμυρις ὁ Θράξ ἐβασίλευσε. Conon 7 εἰς τὴν Ἀκτὴν παραγενομένη τίκτει (sc. νύμφη) κοῦρον Θάμυριν ὃς ἠβήσας ἐπὶ τυσοῦτον ἦκε κιθαρωδίας, ὡς καὶ βασιλέα σφῶν καίπερ ἐπηλύτην ὄντα Σκύθας ποιήσασθαι. The object of such stories was to account for the prevalence of the legend of Thamyras in various parts of the country. Strabo fr. 35 p. 331 ἐν δὲ τῇ ἀκτῇ ταύτῃ (i.e. the coast at the foot of Mt Athos) Θάμυρις ὁ Θράξ ἐβασίλευσε, τῶν αὐτῶν ἐπιτηδευμάτων γεγωνὼς ὢν καὶ Ὀρφύς¹.

In Homer, as Leaf has pointed out, Thamyras is a travelling rhapsode, and, whether by Oechalia is meant the Thessalian or the Messenian town—a point about which even the Alexandrian critics were divided (Waser in Pauly-Wissowa VI 1360)—the scene of his punishment is Dorium in Messene² (Strabo 350, Pausan. 4. 33. 7). See B 594—600

Δώριον, ἔνθα τε Μοῦσαι
ἀντόμεναι Θάμυριν τὸν Θρήκα παῦσαν ἀοιδῆς, Οἰχαλίηθεν ἰόντα παρ' Εὐρύτου Οἰχαλίου·
στεῦτο γὰρ εὐχόμενος νικησέμεν, εἴπερ ἄν αὐταὶ Μοῦσαι ἀείδοιεν, κοῦραι Διὸς αἰγιόχοιο· αἱ δὲ χολωσάμεναι πηρόν θέσαν, αὐτὰρ ἀοιδὴν θεσπεσίην ἀφελοντο καὶ ἐκλέλαθον κιθαριστὴν.

The critics are not agreed whether πηρόν means 'blind,' or is to be explained by the loss of the power of minstrelsy. It will also be observed that Homer does not speak of a formal contest between Thamyras and the Muses; and his account might be taken to imply nothing more than that Thamyras was punished for his insolent boast¹. In [Eur.] Rhes. 916—925 the Muses, coming (I suppose) from Parnassus or Pieria, have to cross the Strymon to meet the Thracian Thamyras in the neighbourhood of Mt Pangaeum :

¹ Riese in Jahrb. f. Philol. XXIII 233 thinks the inference as to the scene of Sophocles' play doubtful.

² Statius follows Homer: Theb. 4. 181 Getico...flebile vati | Dorion; hic fretus doctas anteire canendo | Aoniadas multos Thamyris dominatus in annos | ore simul citharaque (quis obvia numina temnat?) | conticuit praeceps.

Φιλάμμονος παῖ, τῆς ἐμῆς ἥψω φρενός· ὕβρις γάρ, ἣ σ' ἔσφηλε, καὶ Μουσῶν ἔρις τεκεῖν μ' ἔθηκε τόνδε δύστηνον γόνον.
 περῶσα γάρ δὴ ποταμίους διὰ ῥοὰς λέκτροις ἐπλάθην Στρύμονος φυταλμίοις, ὅτ' ἦλθομεν γῆς χρυσόβωλον ἐς λέπας
 Πάγγαιον ὀργάνοισιν ἐξησκημέναι Μοῦσαι μεγίστην εἰς ἔριν μελωδίας κλεινῷ σοφιστῇ Θρηκί, κάτυφλώσαμεν
 Θάμυριν, ὃς ἡμῶν πόλλ' ἐδέννασεν τέχνην.

Euripides mentions a regular contest, and the punishment of blindness, but does not state that Thamyras was also deprived of his musical skill. There can hardly be any doubt that both punishments belonged to the Sophoclean story (cf. frs. 241, 244), as we shall see. Both are recorded by Apollod. 1. 17, who gives further particulars of the conditions of the contest : it was agreed, he says, that if Thamyras was successful, the Muses would accept him as a suitor; but that if he failed, he should lose whatever they chose. To the same effect is schol. Hom. B 595 Θραξ ἐστὶ Φιλάμμονος υἱός· ἐαυτῷ δὲ ὤρισε τῆς μὲν ἥτις τὴν πῆρωσιν πρόστιμον, τῆς δὲ νίκης γάμον μιᾶς τῶν Μουσῶν. φασὶ δὲ αὐτὸν τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν τὸν μὲν γλαυκὸν ἔχειν, τὸν δὲ μέλανα. τότε δὲ τελείως τὸν ἕτερον ἀπώλεσεν. The scholiast means that Thamyras lost the black eye. Although guilty of a ludicrous confusion, the writer of this scholium derived his information from the histrionic tradition. If, therefore, the sources which he used dealt with the dramatic aspect of the story, or, in other words, with the play of Sophocles, it is perhaps legitimate to infer that the conditions which he mentions go back to the same original. The allusion of the scholiast is explained by the description of the mask of Thamyras in Pollux 4. 141 as having one grey and one black eye : cf. the use of γλαύκωμα, γλαυκότης, and γλαυκωσις in medical writers. Lessing explained the arrangement as a conventional method of depicting blindness, which was made effective by the actor turning one side or the other to the spectators as occasion required : that is to say, after the blinding of Thamyras, the actor, whose mask could not be changed, took care to present to the audience the grey eye only. He quoted Quintil. 11. 3. 74 in comœdiis...pater ille, cuius præcipuæ partes sunt, quia interim concitatus interim lenis est, altero erecto altero composito est supercilio: atque id ostendere maxime latus actoribus moris est, quod cum iis quas agunt partibus congruat.

¹ Diod. 3. 67 and Pausan. 4. 33. 7 follow the Homeric account, and it is clear that both understood πηρὼν as 'blind.' For other cases of blinding as the punishment of ὕβρις see Gruppe, p. 1002₃. Hence, according to Plut. de mus. 3 p. 1132 B, Thamyras is said to have composed a poem on the war of the Titans against the gods.

We have no indication of the manner in which the plot was developed. This only is certain, that Thamyras passed from supreme good fortune to utter misery as the result of ὑβρις. One scene seems to have attained universal celebrity—that in which the wretched hero, blind and—what was even worse—deprived in his blindness of the art which might have been his solace, in anger snaps the strings of his lyre and shatters the frame; then, desolate and inconsolable, sits surrounded by the broken fragments. Such at least is a fair inference from the works of art described by Pausanias 9. 30. 2 and especially 10. 30. 8: Θαμύριδι δὲ ἐγγὺς καθεζομένῳ τοῦ Πελῖα διεφθαρμέναι αἱ ὄψεις καὶ ταπεινὸν ἐς ἅπαν σχῆμά ἐστι, καὶ ἡ κόμη πολλὴ μὲν ἐπὶ τῆς κεφαλῆς, πολλὴ δὲ αὐτῷ καὶ ἐν τοῖς γενεαῖς· λύρα δὲ ἔρριπται πρὸς τοῖς ποσὶ, κατεργότες αὐτῆς οἱ πῆχεις καὶ αἱ χορδαὶ κατερρῶνιαι.

A circumstance in the Homeric account of Thamyras which has hardly received any attention is his connexion with Eurytus, from whose home at Oechalia Thamyras is said to have started on his way to Dorium. Now, Eurytus is the counterpart of Thamyras in another sphere: taught the use of the bow by Apollo, he challenged his master and was slain in punishment (Hom. θ 224 ff.). These kindred spirits are coupled by Lucian risca. 6 ἔσθ' ὅστις οὖν ταῦτα εὖ πεπονθὼς παρ' ὑμῶν κακῶς ἂν εἰπεῖν ἐπιχειρήσειεν εὐεργέτας ἄνδρας, ἀφ' ὧν εἶναί τις ἔδοξεν; ἐκτὸς εἰ μὴ κατὰ τὸν Θάμυριν ἢ τὸν Εὐρύττον εἴη τὴν φύσιν ὡς ταῖς Μούσαις ἀντάδειν, παρ' ὧν εἴληφε τὴν ᾠδὴν, ἢ τῷ Ἀπόλλωνι ἐριδαίνειν, ἐναντία τοξέων, καὶ ταῦτα δοτῆρι ὄντι τῆς τοξικῆς. This is probably an instance where the heroes of two similar stories have been brought into association with each other, just as Heracles and Eurytus, the rival bowmen, are for different reasons variously connected.

In Athen. 20 F and vit. Soph. 4 (p. 1 Blaydes) it is said that Sophocles himself played the harp at the representation of the play. It is unnecessary to adopt Welcker's view that Sophocles appeared in the character of Thamyras: in fact, the writer of the Life negatives this assumption by stating that Sophocles differed from the older tragedians in that he relinquished the position of an actor owing to his μικροφωνία.

For the votive tablet supposed to have been painted by Polygnotus for Sophocles after the production of this play see Hauser in O. Jh. 8. 35 ff. There is no literary evidence of its existence.

The name Thamyras belongs properly to the eponymous hero of festal gatherings (Hesych. II p. 300). In regard to its form, Θαμύρας is said to be the Attic for Θάμυρις (Cyrill. lex. ap. Cramer, anecd. Par. IV p. 183, 14), and is attested for Sophocles by the majority of our authorities. See also Adam on Plat. rep. 620 A.

The proverb Θάμυρις (or Ἀμυρίς) μαίνεται applied to those whose conduct bears the aspect of folly, but is really prompted by far-seeing wisdom, has nothing to do with the minstrel (Pausan. fr. 201 Schw.).

237

Θρήσσαν σκοπιὰν Ζηνὸς Ἀθώου

237 Eustath. II. p. 358, 40 ὅτι δὲ Θρηκικός καὶ ὁ Ἀθῶς, οὐ μὲν παρὰ τῷ ποιητῇ (Ξ 229), ἠγλοῖ, φασὶ, Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Θαμύριδι Θρήσσαν εἰπὼν σκοπιὰν Ζηνὸς Ἀθώου.

In the passage of the Iliad which is referred to, Hera leaves Olympus, and speeds across the snowy mountain-tops of Thrace without touching the lower earth, ἐξ Ἀθῶα δ' ἐπὶ πόντον ἐβήσαστο κυμαίνοντα. Athos is one of the Thracian heights: Hom. h. Apoll. 33 Θρηκίως τ' Ἀθῶος. Athos, like other high places (Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 11041), was honoured as a sanctuary of Zeus: Aesch. Ag. 297 Ἀθῶον αἶπος Ζηνός. Hesych. I p. 66, possibly, as Nauck thinks, with reference to this passage, has Ἀθῶος ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ Ἀθῶ τοῦ ὄρους ἱδρυμένος ἀνδριάς, ὁ Ζεὺς. Mela (2. 31) speaks of the summit of Athos as always rising far above the clouds, so that the altar of Zeus remained untouched by rain. For the connexion of Thamyras with this district see Introductory Note.

238

πηκταὶ δὲ λύραι καὶ μαγάδιδες
τά τ' ἐν Ἑλλησιν ξόαν' ἡδυμελῆ

238 Athen. 637 A, quoting Apollodorus ἐν τῇ πρὸς τὴν Ἀριστοκλέους ἐπιστολῇ ἀντιγραφῇ with reference to the μάγαδις. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Θαμύρῃ πηκταὶ... ἡδυμελῆ. Photius lex. p. 239, 15 μάγαδις ψαλτικὸν ὄργανον. οὕτω Σοφοκλῆς.

1 πηκταὶ λύραι is a periphrasis for πηκτίδες, for which see on frs. 241 and 412.—μαγάδιδες: the first syllable of this word is elsewhere short; but it appears on the whole more likely that in the case of a foreign word it might have been occasionally lengthened, than that Meineke was right in reading μαγάδιδες. It should, however, be noticed that though the last syllable of the acc. sing. μάγαδι is short in Diogenes fr. 1, 10 (Nauck, p. 777), it appears to be long in Anacreon fr. 18 (μαγάδην Bergk). The material available is insufficient for the purpose of distinguishing between πηκτίς and μάγαδις; but both belong to the class of foreign, i.e. oriental, stringed instruments, as contrasted with the lyre (or φόρμιγγι) and the later κιθάρα. Both πηκτίς and μάγαδης were Lydian: see Pind. fr. 125, Telestes fr. 5. 4, Diogenes fr. 1. 6, Athen. 634 F. As such they are opposed to the native Greek instruments mentioned in the next line. They were alike also in being played by the hand without the plectrum (χωρίς πλῆκτρον διὰ ψαλμοῦ Aristox. ap. Athen. 635 B). Hence Hesych. III p. 61 μαγαδίdes· ὄργανα ψαλτικά, and Phot. σιγρ.

2 ξόανα is not elsewhere applied to musical instruments, but it seems to be the intention to give a generic description of stringed instruments, which would cover both the λύρα and the κιθάρα. Ellendt refers to Hesych. III p. 171 ξόανα· ...κυρίως δὲ τὰ ἐκ ξύλων ἐξεσμένα ἢ λίθων. The lyre was the oldest stringed instrument and was in general use, whereas the cithara was for the most part employed by professional musicians. See Guhl and Koner, p. 201 ff.; Susemihl-Hicks on Arist. pol. p. 601. There was also a difference of material: the sounding-box of the lyre was made of tortoise shell, and that of the cithara with wood or metal. But it would be wrong to restrict the meaning of ξόανα so as to make it apply solely to the wood-work of the cithara.

239

τρίγωνος

239 Athen. 183 E μνημονεύει δὲ τοῦ τριγώνου τούτου καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν μὲν

Μυσοῖς (fr. 412) ...καὶ ἐν Θαμύρᾳ. For the τρίγωνος see on fr. 412.

240 πρόποδα μέλεα τὰδ' ὅσα κλέομεν

τρήχιμα βάσιμα χέρεσι πόδεσι

240. 1 προσῶδα Ambr. | τὰδ' σε Ambr. | κλέομεν Herwerden: κλαίομεν vel κλύομεν Choer., κλαίομαι Ambr. 2 χερσὶ πόδεσσιν Ambr.

240 Choeroboscus in Hephaest. enchir. p. 60, 17 (=217, 9 Consbr.) τροχαῖος δὲ (sc. λέγεται ὁ χορείος), ἐπειδὴ ὁ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν τῷ Θαμύρᾳ (Θαμύρ U, Θαμύριδι K) φησὶ 'πρόποδα...πόδεσι.' Anon. Ambros. ap. Studemund anecd. I p. 226, 18 διὰ καὶ οὕτως κέκληται ὡς ἀπὸ τῶν χορῶν χορείος παραγωγῶς. ὁ γοῦν Σοφοκλῆς ἐν τῷ Θαμύρᾳ (σοφοκλῆς τὰ θαμύρα cod.) φησὶ 'πρόσῶδα...πόδεσσιν.'

1 πρόποδα has not been explained; but Campbell, who compares προσοδίζειν, not unreasonably suggests that it may mean "giving forwardness to the feet," i.e. "inciting to motion." That is to say, the strict sense is 'moving forward.' Schneidewin (Rh. Mus. II 297) supposed that the chorus, followers of Thamyras, are contrasting the slow processional chant of the Muses (πρόποδα) with the vigorous and passionate strains which they have heard (τὰ δ' ὅσα κλέομεν) from their master. No help is given by the gloss in Phot. Suid. πρόποδες· μεγάλους πόδας ἔχοντες. Nauck suggested πρόσῶδα from the reading of the cod. Ambr., so that πρόσῶδα μέλεα should = προσῶδια; but there is no evidence for an adj. πρόσῶδος, and there are other objections. —κλέομεν (see cr. n.) seems to provide the required sense, and κλύνουσαι is given for κλέουσαι by the codd. in Eur. I. A. 1046. The conjecture, which occurred to me independently, has been anticipated by Herwerden, Headlam and Tucker. Herw. wrote πρόπολε μεγάλε, τὰδε σε κλέομεν. But the break in the synaphea is objectionable: can τὰδε κλεόμενα be right? Headlam (C. R. XIII 3) formerly proposed τανυσικάρμονα, thinking that the corruption was caused by the compound epithet,—a tendency illustrated in C. R. xv 17 and in his no. on Aesch. Ag. 50, 1480. But the passage of Arctinus on which he relies (p. 51 K.) describes the attitude to be adopted in hurling a spear, and is not relevant; nor is the metre satisfactory. Subsequently he seems to have changed his mind; for in C. R. XVI 434 n. he proposed τὰ δ' ὅσα κλῶμεν or κλεῦμεν, or as an alternative, κλύμενα.

2 'With rapid movement of arms and legs.' The reference is to the rhythmical movements of the dance, in which the arms were as important as the legs. Cf. Xen. sympr. 2. 16 οὐδὲν ἀργὸν τοῦ σώματος ἐν τῇ ὀρχήσει ἦν, ἀλλ' ἅμα καὶ τράχηλος καὶ σκέλη καὶ χεῖρες ἐγυμνάζοντο, and see Becker's Charicles, E. tr. p. 102₂₀.—The forms χέρεσι and πόδεσι are unique, if sound, but are related to χέρεσι (Hes. Theog. 519) and πόδεσι: as χεῖρεσι to χεῖρεσι. So the ordinary forms μέλεσι, ἔπεσι are reduced from μέλεσσι, ἔπεσσι: see Monro, H. G. § 102. Nauck at one time proposed to substitute χερὶ τε ποδί τε, but the traditional forms are perhaps defensible. The metre consists of resolved trochaic tetrapodies, such as are occasionally found in Euripides (Phoen. 1030, Hel. 348) and Aristophanes (Lys. 1279); but not, I believe, elsewhere in Sophocles.

241

ὥχῳκε γὰρ κροτητὰ πηκτίδων μέλη, λύραι μοναύλοις τε χειμῶντεως
ναὸς στέρημα κωμασάσης.

241. 1 ὥχῳκε Herwerden: οἰχῳκε codd.

241 Athen. 175 F τοῦ δὲ μοναύλου μνημονεύει Σοφοκλῆς μὲν ἐν Θαμύρᾳ οὕτως: 'ὥχῳκε... κωμασάσης.' Pollux 4. 75 μοναύλος εὐρύημα μὲν ἐστὶν Αἰγυπτίων, μέμνηται δὲ αὐτοῦ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Θαμύριδι.

Welcker thought that the fragment was intended to describe the supersession of the various barbaric instruments mentioned in it; but it is much more likely, as J. supposed, that it formed part of the lament of Thamyra.

1 ὥχῳκε: for the form see Jebb on Ai. 390.—κροτητὰ: 'songs resounding from the harp as it is struck.' (J.) κροτητὰ μέλη may be taken to imply the existence of κροτεῖν μέλος in the sense of to beat music, i.e. to produce a melody by striking (the harp), with μέλος as acc. of result, not unlike Eur. Ion 168 αἰμάξεις φῶδας. Nevertheless the phrase, though correct in itself, is made easier by the attachment of πηκτίδων, to which κροτητῶν might have been accommodated (hypallage). Cf. e.g. Scymnus 260 σιδήρεός τε βαιστήρων κτύπος (cited by H. in C. R. XVI 435). In El. 714 κτύπον κροτητῶν ἀρμάτων is the noise of the bumping cars, as they strike against the earth. Schweighäuser on Athen. l.c. explains κροτητὰ as harmonice pulsatum, bene modulatum, comparing id. 164 F μέλη πάραυλα κάρκροττα κύμβαλα (Tr. fr. adesps. 93), i.e. cymbala sonos edentia dissonos aigue adeo immodulatos; Hesych. I p. 107 ἀκρότητα: πολυκρότητα γεγόμενα. ὥστε

μηδὲ συγκροτεῖσθαι μηδὲ συμπεσεῖν αὐτοῖς. See also on fr. 463.—The πηκτίς was a Lydian species of harp, which is associated with the τρίγωνον (or -ος), a Phrygian triangular harp (Dict. Ant. II 106 b). Cf. fr. 412. (J.) Telestes fr. 5, 4 τοὶ δ' ὀξυφώνοις πηκτίδων ψαλμοῖς κρέκον | Λυδίων ὕμνον. It was played without the plectrum: see note on fr. 238.

2 μοναύλοις: the σὺριγξ μονοκάλαμος, or flute, as distinguished from the σὺριγξ πολυκάλαμος, or Pan's pipe (Dict. Ant. II 840 a). See also Susemihl-Hicks on Arist. pol. 5. 6. 1341^a 18.

The words which follow are hopelessly corrupt: 'nihil dispicio' is Kaibel's verdict. The following conjectures may be recorded: (1) Nauck: λύραι μοναυλοὶ θ' οἷς ἐχαίρομεν τέως. Campbell adds for v. 3 στέρημα' ἀνίας <ἡδὺ> κοίμησις τ' ἄσης. This attractive suggestion recalls fr. 314, 317. (2) Herwerden: λύραι μοναυλοὶ θ' οὐς τύχη, χειμῶν ὅπως | ναὸς τέρεμμα, κωμασάσ' ἀνῆρπασεν; but, as J. points out, neither τέρεμμα nor κωμασάσ' is satisfactory. (3) Jebb, accepting λύραι μοναυλοὶ θ', says: 'I had thought of (1) <ἦν γὰρ εἰ>χ' οἶμην τέως, | πνοῆς ἔρημον κοιμίσας' <ἄτη>... or (2) οὐ κατέσχ' οἶμην θεὸς | πνοῆς ἔρημον κοιμίσας...' (4) Blaydes thought that ναὸς concealed νάβλα: cf. fr. 849. So also Papabasilios, with λύρας μοναύλου καλύμνον αὐλῶν τόνου in v. 2. (5) Jacobs (ap. Schweighäuser) conjectured χαρμονῶν πλέως, and for ναος στέρημα something like δόνακος τέκνον or φύτευμα. (6) H. wrote: 'The instrument used in the κῶμος was commonly the αὐλός: but ναος looks more like δῶδός, which was also its accompaniment. There are however other possibilities, as δαλός or άλαός, or a compound in -στερής.' In J. P. xxxi 8 he suggested δῶδός τ' ἐρήμη πολλά κωμάσασα χεῖρ. (7) R. Ellis: ναός τ' ἐρημοὶ πισσοκωνίας Ἀρης. (8)

Conington, finding μόναυλός τε...μαντεύς in v. 2, proceeds οἰνωμένοις (sic) στέρημα κωμίας Ἀρης. (9) Blaydes: ναός δ' ἐρημος οὐδὲ κῶμος ἔστ' ἔτι. (10) G. Wolff: λύρα μόναυλος. ποῖ τέχνη τε μαντεύς | νόος τ' ἐρημα κομπάσας; 'Something like χειμῶν ὅπως | ναός στερῆσας ἤρπασεν κωπηλάτας might give the required sense, but the corruption is too deep to be healed without fresh evidence.

242

κοῖλον Ἄργος

242 Schol. Soph. O. C. 378 πολλὰ χού τὸ Ἄργος κοῖλον φασὶ καθάπερ καὶ ἐν Ἐπιγυνοῖς (fr. 190) 'τὸ κοῖλον Ἄργος οὐ κατοικήσαντ' ἔτι' καὶ ἐν Θαμύρᾳ (Θαμύρα L) 'ἐκ μὲν Ἐριχθονίου ποτιμάστιον ἔσχεθε κοῖρον | Αὐτόλυκον, πολέων κτεάνων σίνην Ἀργεῖ κοῖλῳ.' Ὀμηρος (δ 1) 'οἱ δ' ἔξον κοῖλην Λακεδαίμονα.'

No modern critic (with the exception of Hartung and Immisch, who thought that the verses formed part of the poetic display) has credited the statement that the two hexameter lines really belonged to the Thamyras. To avoid the difficulty Kirchhoff suggested the transposition of the words Ἐπιγυνοῖς and Θαμύρα, holding that by the Epigoni was meant the cyclic poem bearing that title; and his solution was accepted by Nauck in his first edition, by Dindorf, by Jebb (on O. C. 378), and by Papageorgius in his edition of the scholia. But it has been completely refuted by Bergk for the following reasons. (1) The words ἐν Ἐπιγυνοῖς in this context ought prima facie to refer to the play of Sophocles, and it is highly improbable that, if the scholiast had intended to quote the epic, he would have introduced it in this way. (2) The line which Kirchhoff would attribute to the Thamyras (fr. 190) is, so far as we can tell, entirely unsuitable to that play, whereas it fits naturally with the plot of the Epigoni. It is probable, therefore, that if the citation of the Thamyras was more than a mere reference, the words quoted have dropped out of the text. Nauck takes exception to the contracted κοῖλος in a cyclic poem, but he should at least have referred to Hom. χ 385. We are not concerned with the hexameters, but it should be mentioned that Wilamowitz conjectured ἐκ μὲν ἄρα χθονίον to make them agree with the tradition that Autolycus was the son of Hermes (ἐξ ἐριονίου ἦ, Weil). Others prefer to suppose that Erichthonius had a son of this name (Dümmel in Pauly-Wissowa II 2601). O. Immisch in Jahrb. f. Philol. Suppl. xvii 155 holds that the hexameters are correctly quoted from the play, and that they were part of the agon which must have been represented somehow or other in the course of the action. He points out that Philonis, who is the subject to ἔσχεθε was mother of Philammon, the father of Thamyras, as well as of Autolycus, and that this genealogy appeared as early as Hesiod (see fr. 111 Rz. ἡ τέκεν Αὐτόλυκόν τε Φιλάμμορα τε κλυτὸν ἀδάρη). For κοῖλον Ἄργος see on fr. 190.

243

κάνναβις

243 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 105, 27 κάνναβις. Σοφοκλῆς Θαμύρα, Ἡρόδοτος τετάρτῳ. The allusion to hemp,—probably to hempen garments,—fits the Thracian atmosphere of the play: cf.

Hdt. 4. 74 ἐξ αὐτῆς Θρήκες μὲν καὶ εἴματα ποιοῦνται τοῖσι λυγροῖσι βιοτάτα, Hesyech. II p. 406. Blumner, Technologie, I p. 293.

244

ῥηγνὺς χρυσόδετον κέρας, ῥηγνὺς ἁρμονίαν χορδοτόνου λύρας

244 Plut. de coh. ira 5 p. 455 D ὀργιζομένη καὶ πολέμοις καὶ φίλοις καὶ τέκνοις καὶ γονεῦσι καὶ θεοῖς νῆ Δία καὶ θηρίοις καὶ ἀψύχοις σκεύεσιν, ὡς ὁ Θάμυρις 'ῥηγνὺς...λύρας.' Brunck was the first who assigned the passage to Sophocles.

Pausan. 9. 30. 2 mentions among statues dedicated on Mt Helicon Θάμυριν μὲν αὐτὸν τε ἤδη τυφλὸν καὶ λύρας κατε-αγυίας ἐφαπτόμενον.

1 χρυσόδετον means 'overlaid with' or 'decorated with gold,' as explained by Tucker on Aesch. Theb. 43. Cf. Tibull. 3. 4. 37 (of Apollo) artis opus variae, fulgens testudine et auro | pendebat laeva garrula parte lyra.—κέρας. The statements of ancient authorities relating to the structure of the lyre are very confusing; but anyone who will refer to the illustrations figured in Guhl and Koner at p. 202 will not hesitate to understand κέρας as referring to the πῆχες or arms of the lyre, which were fixed to the sounding-board and connected by the ζυγόν. L. and S. however translate 'the bridge of the lyre,' making κέρας=μαγάδιον, a view which rests on the authority of Pollux 4.

62: see on fr. 36. Cicero also (n. d. 2. 144 in fidibus testudine resonatur aut cornu) speaks as if the sounding-board itself were made of horn, unless cornu is to be taken to refer to the πῆχες. Hesych. II p. 258 equates ζυγά with πῆχες, but this, if correct at all, cannot refer to the lyre.

2 Herwerden reads ῥηγνὺς δ': see on Hclid. 491, 874, Phoen. 563. But for the anaphora with asyndeton H. quotes Eur. I. T. 1096 ποθοῦσ' Ἑλλάνων ἀγῶρους, | ποθοῦσ' Ἀρτεμιν λοχίαν, fr. 839, 4 τί κται θνητοῦς, | τί κται βοτάνην φύλᾳ τε θηρῶν, Bacchyl. 3. 15 βρύει μὲν ἱερὰ βουθότους ἑορταῖς, | βρύονσι φιλοξενίας ἀγῶναι. For the stringing of the lyre cf. Dio Chrys. 8. 4 ἐνίοτε μὲν οὖν ἐπέτειεν αὐτὸν, ἐνίοτε δὲ ἐπειράτο ἀνιέναι, ὥσπερ οἱ χορδοστροφῶται τὰ νεύρα τείνουσι, προσέχοντες μὴ ραγῆ. Hence ἐπτάτονος Eur. I. T. 1129 etc. The metre is logaedic (aeolic), v. 1 being a glyconic, and v. 2 an asclepiad trimeter

See J. W. White in C. Q. III 293, Schroeder, Soph. cant. p. 83.

245

μουσομανεῖ δ' ἐλάμφθην δ' ἂν καὶ τὸ ποτὶ δειράν, ἔχομαι δ' ἔκ τε λύρας ἔκ τε νόμον οὖς Θαμύρας
περίαλλα μουσοποιεῖ.

245. 1 ἐλαφθῆν cod. Pal., ἐθάλφθην coni. Brunck, ἐμαρφθῆν M. Schmidt, ἐλῆφθῆν Bernardakis | δακέτω Brunck 2 ἔχομαι Blaydes et H.: εἶχομαι Pal. V², ἔρχομαι rell. 3 οὖς Porson: οὐ codd. 4 περί ἄλλα ante Porsonum

245 Plut. non posse suaviter vivi secundum Epicurum II p. 1093 D, describing the entrancing pure delight of certain intellectual studies: αἱ δ' ἀπὸ γεωμετρίας καὶ ἀστρολογίας καὶ ἁρμονικῆς, ὁρμὴ καὶ ποικίλον ἔχουσιν τὸ δέλεαρ, οὐδενὸς τῶν ἀγωγίμων ἀποδέουσιν, ἔλκουσαι καθάπερ ἐν γὰρ τοῖς διαγράμμασιν ὧν ὁ γενεσάμενος, ὥσπερ ἔμπειρος ἦ, τὰ σοφοκλέους περιεῖσιν ἄδων 'μουσομανεῖ...

μουσοποιεῖ'—καὶ νῆ Δι' Εὐδοξος καὶ Ἀρίσταρχος καὶ Ἀρχιμήδης.

H., accepting δακέτω and reading ἔχομαι ('Fort. ἴσχομαι aut ἔχομαι, Blaydes), renders and comments as follows: "'I was <seized> in the throat by a melody-maddening snake; by the lyre I am possessed and by the strains that Thamyra makes music with surpassingly"—aye, and not only

Thamyrras but Eudoxus and Aristarchus and Archimedes:—who, as Plutarch goes on to illustrate with well-known stories, were themselves possessed with ecstasy inspired by their discoveries in science: Archimedes, for example (1094 C), ἐνοήσας τὴν τοῦ στεφάνου μέτρῃσιν αὖτον ἐκ τινος κατοχῆς ἢ ἐπιπνοίας ἐξήλατο βοῶν "εὐρηκα," καὶ τοῦτο πολλάκις φθεγγόμενος ἐβάδιζεν. The melodies of Thamyrras have had an effect upon the speaker such as those of the musician Alexander had upon the Romans: he created such a furor, says Athenaeus (183 E), οὕτως ἐποίησε πάντας Ῥωμαίους μουσομανεῖν ὡς τοὺς πολλοὺς καὶ ἀπορρημονεῖν αὐτοῦ τὰ κροῦσματα. Whatever the verb was, ποτὶ δεῖράν is to be constructed with it, "I was stricken at the throat" (the part which is the instrument of singing), as in Aesch. Eum. 595, where Orestes says I slew my mother ξιφουλκῶ χειρὶ πρὸς δέρην τεμὼν. The critics, except Bernardakis, who accepts εὐχομαι and supplies for it an inf. ἔλῶν from his conjecture in the previous line (see cr. n.), reading ἐρχομαι, have taken ποτὶ δεῖράν with it, "and I come to the mountain-ridge"; and since δεῖράν in that sense has no authority, Brunck (approved by Ellendt s.v. δεῖράς) altered it to ποτὶ δεῖράδα ἐρχομαι: Campbell too translates "and make my way to the ridge," but doubts, conjecturing ποτὶ δ' εἶραν ἐρχομαι "and I go to the public place." ἐρχομαι is used for κατέχομαι, as e.g. ἔχω appears for προσέχω in Phil. 305. The usual phrases were οὐ γὰρ ἐκ Μουσῶν, ἀλλ' ἐκ Κορυβάντων τινῶν κατέχεσθε Dio Chrys. I 682, κατὰσχετος ἐκ Νυμφῶν Pausan. 10. 12. 11, κάτοχος ἐκ Μουσῶν Lucian 11 5. Cf. Plat. Ion 536 A καὶ ὁ μὲν τῶν ποιητῶν ἐξ ἄλλης Μούσης, ὁ δ' ἐξ ἄλλης ἐξήρηται. ὀνομάζομεν δὲ αὐτὸ κατέχεται· τὸ δὲ ἐστὶ παραπλήσιον· ἔχεται γάρ. ἐκ δὲ τούτων τῶν πρώτων δακτυλίων, τῶν ποιητῶν, ἄλλοι ἐξ ἄλλου αὐτῷ ἡρτημένοι εἰσὶ καὶ ἐνθουσιάζουσιν, οἱ μὲν ἐξ Ὀρφέως, οἱ δὲ ἐκ Μουσαίου· οἱ δὲ πολλοὶ ἐξ Ὀμήρου κατέχονται τε καὶ ἔχονται. ὦν σὺ, ὦ Ἴων, εἰς εἰ καὶ κατέχει ἐξ Ὀμήρου· ἐρχομαι is probably correct, and completes the restoration initiated by Porson (on Med. 284) of the latter part of the fragment. But the first line is desperately corrupt; and I cannot feel satisfied that Brunck's δακέτω, though diplomatically excellent, is suitable to the present context. It has not been observed that μουσομανεῖ may be a verb; and I incline to this solution, with ποτὶ δεῖράν = towards the throat, as in Aesch. Ag. 340 οὐκέτ' ἐξ ἐλευθέρου δέρης ἀποιμώζουσι φιλάτων μύρον. The sense of the intervening words, which must then contain the subject, might be given by reading μουσομανεῖ δ' ἀναφθὲν (or possibly even δὲ λαμβθὲν) λήμ' ἀνεκὰς ποτὶ δεῖράν,—or as the accent of cod. Pal. suggests, μουσομανεῖ δ' ἐλαφρὴν ἔσμ' ἀνετον ποτὶ δεῖράν. Herwerden conjectured in v. 1 f. ποτὶ δ' οὐρανὸν αἶρωμαι (so also Wyttenbach) ἐκ τε λύρας κτέ. Wyttenbach's view that καὶ τὸ are simply the words of Plutarch linking together two quotations deserves passing mention. Mekler conjectured after δακέτω, ποτὶ δ' ἱρὰν ἐρχομαι δαῖτ' ἐκ κτέ., i.e. to the banquet of the Muses.

The metre is of the Ionic (choriambic) type, but for obvious reasons the analysis is doubtful. It should be added that H. was led partly by metrical considerations to his conjecture ἐρχομαι. The anacloemenos περίελλα μουσοποιεῖ is a common clausula in Ionics: see e.g. Aesch. Suppl. 1043.

ΘΗΣΕΥΣ

Welcker (p. 402) holds that the solitary reference to this play is an error, and that the Phaedra was the play intended. There is no reason why Sophocles should not have written a play entitled Theseus, just as Euripides did, who dramatized the Cretan adventure under that title. The evidence in its favour is very slender, and may be untrustworthy; but we ought not to refuse to credit it without some stronger reason than Welcker is able to adduce. The subject must in any case be uncertain: Welcker records a baseless guess by Gruppe that it comprised the death of Theseus in Scyros (Plut. Cim. 8 etc.). If the title is an error, the most probable solution is to ascribe the quotation to the Aegeus (p. 15).

246

ὀμπνίου νέφους

246 Phot. lex. p. 342, 11 and Suid. s.v. ὀμπνιον (ὀμπνιον Phot.) νέφος· μέγα, πολύ, ὑψημένον. Σοφοκλῆς Θησεΐ. Suid. adds: καὶ ὀμπνιος χεῖρ, ἡ πλουσία, a gloss which precedes ὀμπνιον νέφος in Phot. Cf. Phot. lex. p. 335, 9 ὀμπνιον νέφους· μεγίστου. Hesych. 111 p. 206 ὀμπνείου νέφους· μεγάλου, πολλοῦ, ὑψημένον. Diogen. 6. 97 ὀμπνιος χεῖρ, ἡ πλουσία. ὀμπνιον νέφος, μέγα, πολύ, ὑψημένον.

The title Demeter ὀμπνία (schol. Nic. Al. 7, Clid 111 26, 2. 3) shows the original force of the adjective (cf. alma Ceres); and there does not seem to be any close parallel to the Sophoclean phrase, which was preserved as a curiosity at a time when the word had become obsolete. ὀμπνιος χεῖρ, 'a lavish hand,' is much nearer to the original. ὀμπνιον ἔργον in Callim. fr. 183 is interpreted as agriculture. May it not be that the epithet was attached to νέφος, because the rain-cloud fertilizes the parched earth?

ΘΥΕΣΤΗΣ ΕΝ ΣΙΚΥΩΝΙ

For the possible connexion of the title Thyestes with the Atrous see p. 91. We have there pointed out that, while it is maintainable that Sophocles wrote two plays entitled Thyestes as well as the Atrous, all we can affirm with certainty is that two plays of Sophocles dealt with the banquet-story and the later history of Thyestes respectively, and that to the latter was given the title Thyestes at Sicyon. The chief authority now extant for the later history of the two brothers is Hygin. fab. 88, which by general consent is admitted to have been derived from the play of Sophocles. The confused narrative of Hyginus divides into three parts, after a reference to the turning back of the Sun's chariot in horror at the impious banquet. In the first part Thyestes is said to have fled to King Thesprotus, whose country was near lake Avernus, and thence to Sicyon where his daughter Pelopia had been placed in security. He found her sacrificing to Athena, and, fearing to pollute the sanctity of the site by his presence, hid himself in the neighbouring grove. Pelopia slipped while dancing, stained her robe with the victim's blood, and withdrew to wash it in the river. Thyestes, covering his head, rushed from the grove and violated her. Pelopia drew his sword from its scabbard, and returning to the temple hid it beneath the pedestal of the statue of the goddess. On the next day Thyestes asked the king to restore him to Lydia, his native land. There is no mention here of the oracle given to Thyestes that the son born to him by his daughter Pelopia was destined to be the avenger of his brother's crime. This essential part of the legend appears, however, in the brief and mutilated chapter which precedes (fab. 87), as well as in the imperfect account of Apollodorus (epit. 2. 14). Cf. Lactant. on Stat. Theb. 1. 694 cum responsum accepisset Thyestes aliter malorum remedium inveniri non posse, nisi cum Pelopea filia concubuisset, paruissetque responsis, etc. The last quotation should not lead us to suppose that in the original form of the story Thyestes recognized his daughter, although the account of Hyginus is far from explicit on this point. Anyhow, so far as Sophocles is concerned, it is hardly necessary to appeal to the testimony of Aristotle (poet. 13. 1453^a 9—11), in order to refute such an inference being drawn concerning his version. The confusion in Hyginus between Thesprotus and the king of Sicyon becomes still more puzzling in the second division of the chapter: in consequence of a drought at Mycenae, Atreus was ordered by the oracle to bring back Thyestes. He accordingly journeyed to the court of Thesprotus, thinking that Thyestes was there, saw Pelopia, whom he believed to be the daughter of Thesprotus, and asked for her hand in marriage. Thesprotus, 'to avoid any suspicion,'—a mysterious comment—consented. But Pelopia was already pregnant by Thyestes, and exposed the child when born. The shepherds, however, gave him to a she-goat to suckle (Aegisthus), and Atreus had a search made for him, and brought him up as his own son. The concluding section in Hyginus is so closely compressed that it may as well be given in his own words: interim Atreus mittit Agamemnonem et Menelaum filios ad quaerendum Thyestem: qui Delphos petierunt sciscitatum. casu Thyestes eo venerat ad sortes tollendas de ultione fratris. comprehensus ab eis ad Atreum perducitur. quem Atreus in custodiam coniici iussit Aegisthumque vocat, existimans suum filium esse, et mittit eum ad Thyestem interficiendum. Thyestes cum vidisset Aegisthum et gladium quem Aegisthus gerebat et cognovisset quem in compressione perdiderat, interrogat Aegisthum, unde illum haberet. ille respondit matrem sibi Pelopiam dedisse: quam iubet accersiri. cui respondit se in compressione nocturna nescio cui eduxisse et ex ea compressione Aegisthum concepisse. tunc Pelopia gladium arripuit simulans se agnoscere (?) et in pectus sibi detrusit: quem Aegisthus e pectore matris cruentum tenens ad Atreum attulit. ille existimans Thyestem interfectum laetabatur: quem Aegisthus in litore sacrificantem occidit et cum patre Thyeste in regnum avitum redit.

Brunck inferred that the material for two plays was to be found in the chapter of Hyginus, and that the scene of the earlier was to be placed at Sicyon, that of the later at Mycenae. Curtailed and abbreviated as the text of Hyginus obviously is, we can scarcely fail to recognize the influence of a tragedian in the concluding portion, more particularly in the ἀναγνώρισις and the suicide of Pelopia. But the earlier events are inconclusive, and not well suited, so far as we can judge, to dramatic representation. Agreeing, therefore, with Brunck that Sophocles' play Θυέστης ἐν Σικυῶνι was the ultimate source of Hyginus, I think it more likely that the earlier incidents, so far as they were material to the issue, were made known to the spectators either in the prologue or in the course of the action, and did not form the subject of a separate drama. It can hardly be doubted that fr. 247 alludes to the oracle given to Thyestes, but the words may quite well have been spoken after its prediction had been fulfilled. Rossbach (Philol. Abhandl. M. Hertz dargebracht, p. 255) inferred from Hygin. fab. 254 Pelopia Thyestis filia in patrem (sc. piissima fuit) ut eum vindicaret that Pelopia knew of the oracle and recognized her father, but nevertheless submitted to disgrace in order to secure his revenge. Welcker (p. 369) takes a different view, thinking that the subject of the second Thyestes and of the Pelopidae of Accius is to be found in Hygin. fab. 86, Thyestes Pelopis et Hippodamiae filius quod cum Aeropa Atrei uxore concubuit a fratre Atreo de regno est eiectus. At is Atrei filium Plisthenem, quem pro suo educaverat, ad Atreum interficiendum misit: quem Atreus credens fratris filium esse imprudens filium suum occidit. This is a pure guess, prompted by the necessity of finding a plot for the second Thyestes, and it is much more likely that Hygin. 86 is based on the Pleisthenes of Euripides (TGF p. 556). Dindorf solves the problem by his favourite device of a second edition (see p. 4).

It should be added that the incest of Thyestes is alluded to as a tragic subject by Plat. legg. 838 c. See also Friedlaender on Juv. 7. 92.

247

σοφὸς γὰρ οὐδεὶς πλὴν ὃν ἂν τιμᾷ θεός.
ἀλλ' εἰς θεοὺς <σ'> ὀρῶντα, κἂν ἔξω δίκης χωρεῖν κελεύῃ, κείσ' ὁδοιπορεῖν χρεών.
αἰσχροὺς γὰρ οὐδὲν ὧν ὑφηγούνται θεοί.

247. 2 σ' add. Seyffert

247 Orion flor. 5. 10 (Schneidewin comit. crit. p. 47) ἐκ τοῦ α' Θυέστου, σοφὸς...θεοί. V. 1 without the name of poet or play is also quoted in flor. Monac. 103.

1 Beynen conjectured ὅς ἂν τιμᾷ θεός, and Nauck, while condemning this as perverse, followed Meineke in the view that the line ought to be separated from the rest of the fragment, and was inclined to think that v. 4 had no connexion with vv. 2, 3. Similarly F. W. Schmidt (Krit. Stud. I 254), who rewrites the passage in order to avoid the supposed incompatibility of ἔξω δίκης with ἀσχερόν οὐδέν. But all the lines appear to be part of an answer to an objection (of Thyestes?) that, if the oracle pointed to incest, its injunction must be disregarded: see Introductory Note. The reply is that such considerations cannot be allowed, since human wisdom is of no avail unless it is blessed by heaven. The attitude towards σοφία is similar to that of Eur. Bacch. 200 ff. and other passages in the same play; in Sophocles it does not surprise us. For θεός τιμῶ cf. Aesch. fr. 302, Theb. 703, Eur. Her. 1338 θεοὶ δ' ἔσαν τιμῶσιν οὐδὲν δεῖ φίλων. F. W. Schmidt adds Hes. Theog. 81, Theogn. 169.

2 ff. These lines have been cleared up by Wecklein's proposal to insert σ' and treat κελεύω as second pers. sing. of the pass. subjunctive. The same suggestion was made independently by Tucker (C. R. xvii 190) and by Blaydes, who, however, inclined to εἰς θεόν σ' ὄραν τε κτέ. The insertion of σ' appears to have been proposed first by Seyffert (Rh. Mus. xv 615), but he wished to substitute θεόν for θεός, in order to provide κελεύω with a subject. It is natural to compare the passage with Euripides' famous line (fr. 292, 7) εἰ θεοὶ τι δρώσιν αἰσχρόν, οὐκ εἰσὶν θεοί, and the contrast is significant of the attitude of the two poets towards morality and religion. Sophocles is serenely confident that no reconciliation of their claims is necessary; if morality seems to conflict with the will of the gods, so much the worse for it. But for Euripides, if the gods seem to enjoin an immoral action, they become untrue to their nature and are no longer trustworthy. See Nestle's article on Sophocles und die Sophistik in Class. Philol. v 129 ff. The present lines would accurately describe the position of Orestes in the Electra, who has no hesitation in obeying the command of Apollo, even though it involves matricide: see v. 1424 τὰν δόμοισι μὲν | καλῶς, Ἀπόλλων εἰ καλῶς ἐθέσπισεν, and Jebb's Introd. p. xli.—ὀδοιπορεῖν is used 10 times by Sophocles, but not at all by Aeschylus or Euripides. For ἔξω δίκης cf. Eur. Andr. 786, Bacch. 1010 τὰ δ' ἔξω νόμιμα | δίκας ἐκβαλόντα τιμῶν θεούς. The context here limits δίκη to the sphere of established or conventional morality. The conception of δίκη as a human institution was as old as Hesiod (Op. 279): cf. Plat. Prot. 322 c. The word is so applied in accordance with its original meaning of custom or order, for which see F. M. Cornford, From Religion to Philosophy, p. 172 ff.—For the acc. after ὑφηγέσθαι, involved in the attracted ὦν ('where the gods take the lead, prompt') cf. Lys. 33. 3 ἐκεῖνος μὲν ὦν ταῦθ' ὑφηγήσατο,—such was the lead given by Heracles.

248

ἀποπλήκτω ποδί

248 Hesych. I p. 254 ἀποπλήκτω ποδί· μανιώδει. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη Σικυνίῳ.

For the word cf. Phil. 731 τί δή... σωπῆς κάποπλήκτος ὥδ' ἔχει; Ant. 1189 κάποπλήσσομαι, i.e. 'I faint away.' Dem. 21. 143 οὐχ οὕτως εἴμ' ἄφρων οὐδ' ἀπόπληκτος ἐγώ. 34. 16 οὕτως ἀπόπληκτον καὶ παντελῶς μαινόμενον. There is a similar transference of the adjective in O. T. 479 μελέω ποδί, ibid. 877 ποδί χρησίμω, Eur. Phoen. 834 τυφλῶ ποδί, Aesch. Eum. 545 ἀθέω ποδί, Tr. fr. adesp. 227 λαθάργω ποδί. See also on fr. 790.

249

ἀμόρφωτον

249 Hesych. I p. 151 ἀμόρφωτον· ἀδιατύπωτον. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη τῷ ἐν Σικυνῶνι. Cf. Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 94, 15 ἀμόρφωτος· ἀδιόρθωτος, ἀπλαστος, ἀσχημάτιστος.

ἀμόρφωτος, formless, reappears as an epithet of ἔλη in the pseudo-Pythagorean treatise published under the name of Timaeus Locrus, 94 A (vulg. ἀμορφόν). It is not a genuine verbal,—for we may leave out of account the scholastic ἀμορφώω, —but an amplified substitute for ἀμορφος such as the tragedians were prone to coin. Similar instances are ἀφύλλωτος O. T. 885 beside ἀφύλλος, ἀτάρβητος Ai. 197 beside ἀταρβής, χρυσόκόλλητος Eur. Phoen. 2 beside χρυσόκολλος, καλλιπύργωτος Bacch. 19 beside καλλιπύργος, ἀμαρτύρητος Her. 290 beside ἀμαρτύρος, ἀφύλλωτος fr. 299 beside ἀφύλλος. See the excellent note of Willamowitz on Eur. Her. l.c., and further on fr. 1014.

250

αὐτόμοιρος

250 αὐτόμοιρος Casaubon: αὐτόμορος cod.

250 Hesych. I p. 327 αὐτόμοιρος (αὐτόμορος cod.). μονόμοιρος. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη Σικωνίῳ (Θυέστη σικωνία cod.: corr. Musurus). The traditional interpretation, followed by Liddell and Scott, with special destiny, is almost nonsense. Following the analogy of διμοιρος, we should conclude that μονόμοιρος as applied to a person means 'having a single share.' 'Sharing alone' is an illogical but emphatic term to express sole possession (oxymoron): cf. the use of μονομερής. αὐτοπάμων, if that word is really the source of the Hesychian αὐτόπομα. ἐπικληρον, would be the nearest parallel.

251

αὐτόφορτοι

251 Hesych. I p. 329 αὐτόφορτοι. αὐτοδιακονοί, κυρίως δὲ οἱ ἐν τοῖς ἰδίοις πλοίοις. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη Σικωνίῳ (Θυέστη σικωνία cod.: corr. Musurus). ὁ δὲ Κρατῖνος ἐν Σείρωνι (fr. 248, i 88 K.) τοὺς τὰ κοινὰ φορτιζομένους ἔφη.

αὐτόφορτος is properly and strictly applied to the ναύκληρος who voyages with his own cargo on board his own ship, as contrasted on the one hand with the seaman who carried for hire, and on the other with the merchant who ventured his goods in another's bottom. In Aesch. Cho. 671 στείχοντα δ' αὐτόφορτον οἰκέα σαγή the speaker describes himself as a travelling merchant, contrasted with a carrier. Cratinus, however, seems to have used the word for those who embezzled public monies. Such at least is Meineke's view which Kock adopts; but the latter thinks that the word κοινοφόρους may have fallen out before ἔφη.

252

ἐπαίνους

252 Hesych. II p. 132 ἐπαίνους. τὰς κρίσεις καὶ τὰς συμβουλίας καὶ τὰς ἀρχαιρείας (ἀρχεσίας cod.). Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη Σικωνίῳ. καὶ ἀλκείοι ταῖς ἐπαινηταῖσιν (ita cod.).

The explanatory words 'decisions, recommendations, and elections (i.e. support of a particular individual)' may be taken to refer to the approval of an assembly which voted and elected its officers by acclamation. Such was the Spartan ἀπελλα: Thuc. I. 87 κρίνουσι γὰρ βῆθι καὶ οὐ ψήφῳ. See further Greenidge, Handbook of Greek constitutional antiquities, p. 100. In this respect no doubt

Sparta adhered to the procedure of the heroic age: cf. Hom. Γ' 461 ὥς ἔφατ' Ἀτρεΐδης, ἐπὶ δ' ἤνεον ἄλλοι Ἀχαιοί, Eur. Hec. 811 στρατὸς δ' ἐπήνεσεν, Or. 901 ἐπερρόθησαν δ' οὐ μὲν ὡς καλῶς λέγοι, | οἱ δ' οὐκ ἐπήνον. The concluding words were no doubt rightly referred to Alcaeus (fr. 128) by Maussac and Voss. Nauck substitutes τοῖς for ταῖς without comment, and it certainly seems probable that Alcaeus used ἐπαινέτης of a political supporter, rather than that ταῖς ἐπαινεταῖσιν is correct. Bergk's alternative suggestions that Sophocles wrote δὲ ἀλκάδοι τοῖς ἐπαινεταῖσιν or τοῖς ἐπαινεταῖσιν alone are very unlikely.

253

ἀφωσιωμέναι

253 Hesych. 1 p. 338 ἀφωσιωμέναι· ἀνόσαι, ἀποθεν τοῦ ὁσίου γεγεννημέναι. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη β'. Cf. ibid. p. 341 ἀφωσιωμέναι· ἀποθεν τοῦ ὁσίου ἀφωρισμέναι.

The important word ἀφωσιωμέναι, more common in the middle, cannot be fully treated here. The meaning attested by Hesych. arises from the double sense of dedication, seen in such words as devotus, sacer, āgros, which has been well compared by Miss Harrison (Prolegomena, pp. 59, 108) with the condition of the savage tabu. Thus ἀφωσιωμέναι, to separate from the ὁσία, is to make an āgros or tabu; and a φαρμακός would properly be described as ἀφωσιωμένος. Cf. Hippoxax fr. 11 ὡς οἱ μὲν ἄγει Βουπάλῳ καθρώοντο. In this sense ἀφωσιωμέναι is equivalent to ἐναγίζειν, and is contrasted with ἀφαγνίζειν, to remove from the tabu or to disenchant, for which cf. Eur. Alc. 1144, and ἀφιεροῦν, which has the same meaning in Aesch. Eum. 454 (of Orestes, as ἀφαγνίζειν in Pausan. 2. 31. 8). Hence ἀφωσιωσθαι commonly = to abominate (aversari): see Holden on Plut. Sull. 22. 4, and Wyttenbach's list of examples in his n. on πιστ. 63 B.

254

ἡγόμην

254 Hesych. 11 p. 264 ἡγόμην· διήγον. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη δευτέρῳ. The same interpretation was traditionally given to O. T. 775 ἡγόμην δ' ἀνὴρ | δάτων μέγιστος τῶν ἐκεί, πρὶν μοι τύχη | τοιάδ' ἐπέστη: see the schol. ἐτρεφόμεν, ἐτύγχανον, and Suid. s.v. ἡγόμην. Modern editors all prefer the rendering 'I was considered'; but there is no gain to the sense in its adoption, and, if the editors are right, the present gloss of Hesychius does not deserve credit. Yet ἡγόμην, 'I lived,' seems to be justified by the corresponding use of the active in Dem. 9. 36 ἦν τι τότε...δ' ἐλευθέραν ἦγε τὴν Ἑλλάδα: see also on Eur. Hclid. 788. Cf. El. 782, where Musgrave quoted Philostr. vit. Apoll. 5. 42 μελιττοῦται διήγετο καὶ ἄρτοις κτέ. Several other examples from Philostratus are quoted by W. Schmid, Atticismus, IV p. 346.

255

ἔστι γάρ τις ἐναλία
Εὐβοίης αἶα· τῇδε βακχεῖος βότρυς

255. 2 Εὐβοίης αἶα L. Dindorf: εὐβοήσασα codd. plerique, Εὐβοίης ἀκτὴ Meineke | βάκχως Blaydes

255 Schol. Eur. Phoen. 227 Σοφοκλῆς δὲ ἐν Θυέστη Ιστορεῖ καὶ παρ' Εὐβοίης οἰοίαν ἀμπελὸν εἶναι τῆς ἐν Παρνασσῷ, λέγων οὕτως· 'ἔστι...ποτόν.'

The miraculous growth of the vine is one of the portents which attest the presence of Dionysus (Hom. h. 7. 35 ff.); and this accounts for its appearance at Delphi and at Nysa. For the facts cf. schol. Soph. Ant. 1133 ἡ τὸ ἐν Εὐβοίᾳ φησὶν ἄλσος ἡ τὸ ἐν Παρνασσῷ· ἐν ἀμφοτέροις γὰρ τόποις ἡ ἀμπελος ἡ καθ' ἐκάστην ἡμέραν περὶ μὲν τὴν ἑω βότρυας φέρει, περὶ δὲ τὴν μεσημβρίαν ὀμφακας, ἐτρυνγὰτο δὲ πεπαρθεῖσα περὶ τὴν ἑσπέραν. Steph. Byz. p. 479 Νῦσαι...δεκάτη ἐν Εὐβοίᾳ, ἐνθα διὰ μιᾶς ἡμέρας τὴν ἀμπελὸν φασὶν ἀνθεῖν καὶ τὸν βότρυα πεπαίνεισθαι. Schol. Townl. Hom. N 21 ἐν Αἰγαίς τῆς Εὐβοίας παράδοξα πολλά γίνονται. κατὰ γὰρ τὰς ἐτησίους τοῦ Διονύσου τελετὰς ὀργιαζομένων τῶν μυστικῶν γυναικῶν βλαστάνουσιν αἱ καλούμεναι ἐφήμεροι ἀμπελοὶ, αἵτινες ἔωθεν μὲν τὰς τῶν καρπῶν ἐκβολὰς ποιοῦνται, εἰτ' αὖ πάλιν βότρυας βαρυτάτους, καὶ τούτους πρὸ μεσημβρίας πεπαίνουσιν, πρὸς

ἐπ' ἡμαρ ἔρπει. πρῶτα μὲν λαμπρᾶς ἔω κεκλημάτῳται χλωρὸν οἰνάνθης δέμας· εἴτ' ἡμαρ αὔξει μέσσον ὄμφακος τύπον, 5
καὶ κλίνεται τε κάποπερκοῦται βότρυν·

3 λαμπρᾶς ἔω B, λαβρασεω A, λαβρᾶς H, λαβραδέω MT, λαβρᾶς ἔω M. Schmidt
4 χλωρὸν Bergk: χῶρον AMT, χῶρος BI | οἰνάνθης Barnes: εὐάνθης I, εὐάνθης B, εὐάνθης AMT 5 ἡμαρ αὔξει Palat. 343. ἡμαρ αὔξει TAB, ἡμαράζει M | μέσσον
codd. meliores 6 καὶ κλίνεται τε B: καὶ κλίνεται γε vulgo δὲ τὴν ἑσπέραν δρεπόμεναι ἄκρατον χορηγοῦσι δαφιλῇ ταῖς ἀπὸ τοῦ χοροῦ παρθένοισι.

Eustath. II. p. 882, 38 Αἰγὰς ἢ τὰς ἐν Εὐβοίᾳ λέγει, ἐνθα μυνέεται τὸ κατὰ τὰς ἐφημέρους αὐπέλους, αἶ, φασίν, ἔωθεν ἀντιστάσαι, πρὸς μεσημβρίαν πεπαινοῦσι βότρυν, ἑσπέρας δὲ ἄκρατον χορηγοῦσι δαφιλῇ τῇ χορῇ τῶν τελευτούμενων τῇ Διονύσω κτλ. From such evidence it has been inferred with reason that Nysa was in the immediate neighbourhood of Aegae, a town on the west coast of Euboea. From Strab. 405 we learn that Aegae was opposite to Anthedon at a distance of 120 stades across the Euripus.
The similar vine on Mt Parnassus is described in Eur. Phoen. 229 οἶνα θ', ἃ καθά-μεριον | στάζει τὸν πολύκαρπον | οἰνάνθας λεῖσα βότρυν. For Nysa see on fr. 959.

2 βακχεῖος: see cr. n. Our mss are useless in distinguishing between βάκχιος and βακχεῖος, as is shown by Ant. 154, Trach. 219, 510, 704, in all of which places they give forms of βακχεῖος against the metre. The only certain instance of βακχεῖος in Sophocles is O. T. 1105. In Euripides βάκχιος is certain in Hec. 686, Ion 1126, Bacch. 1057; and Elmsley on Bacch. 308 held that Euripides avoided
βάκχιος, except as the name of the god.
These facts are hardly sufficient to warrant the adoption of βάκχιος, although it may very well be right. For the accentuation βακχεῖος rather than βάκχειος see Chandler, § 381.

3 ἐπ' ἡμαρ ἔρπει, grows for a day— and no more. We should not render every day (καθ' ἡμέραν): there is a distinction between O. C. 1364 ἄλλους ἐκατὶ τὸν καθ' ἡμέραν βίον—'my daily bread'—and Eur. El. 429 τῆς δ' ἐφ' ἡμέραν βορᾶς | ἐς συμκρὸν ἔκει (sc. τὰ χρήματα)—'wealth hath small part in the day's needs.' Similarly Cycl. 336 τοῦμ-πιεῖν γε κάμφαγεῖν τοῦφ' ἡμέραν—'my portion for the day.' J. quotes Hdt. 1. 32 οὐ γὰρ τι ὁ μέγα πλοῖστος τοῦ ἐπ' ἡμέρην ἐχοντος ὀλβιώτερός ἐστι, Eur. Phoen. 401
ποτέ μὲν ἐπ' ἡμαρ εἶχον, εἴτ' οὐκ εἶχον ἄν.—

M. Schmidt's λιβρᾶς (cr. n.) is based on λιβρὸν σέλας (Tr. fr. adesj. 232).

4 κεκλημάτῳται: 'the green vine-shoot puts forth its tendril.' The early growth of the vine is described distribu-tively in respect of each twig. The proper meaning of οἰνάνθη is given by schol. Ar. Az. 588 as ἡ πρώτη ἐκφυσις τῆς σταφυλῆς: so Hesych., Suid., schol.
Ar. Ran. 1320. It should be observed that in none of the passages quoted by L. and S. for that meaning is οἰνάνθη used for the vine itself. There is consequently the less reason for following J., who, taking οἰνάνθης δέμας as the vine-stock, treated χλωρὸν as proleptic: 'the stock of the vine has put forth green shoots.' The perfect is gnomic as in
El. 64 εἴθ' ὅταν δόμους | ἔλθωσιν αἰθῆς, ἐκτεπληρῆται πλέον. See Gildersleeve, § 257, Goodw. § 155.

5 μέσσον is used by Sophocles in dialogue also at Ant. 1223, 1236. Eur.
only employs the form in lyrics. In this respect the Ionism of Sophocles is well-known: see on fr. 799, 4.—ὄμφακος τύπον, the form of the unripe grape.

6 καὶ κλίνεται τε is undoubtedly right. Such conjectures as πεπαινοῦται τε (Nauck) and γλυκαίνονται τε (Meineke) are quite beside the mark, as was recognized by Gomperz and independently by Headlam. 'And, as it wanes, the cluster is empurpled.' For the use of τε...καὶ in place of ὅτε of contemporaneous events see Kuehner-Gerth, § 516, 8 (II 231), and H. on Aesch. Ag. 189. The credit of first advocating the claims of τε here belongs to Wex on Ant. 1164 (1186).—
κάποπερκοῦται expresses the final change of colour when the grape is ripe: see n. on Eur. Phoen. 1160. There is a good illustration in Achill. Tat. 2. 3, describing the appearance of a gemmed cup: οἱ δὲ βότρυες πάντῃ περικρεμάμενοι· ὁμφαξ μὲν αὐτῶν ἕκαστος ὅσον ἢ κενὸς ὁ κρατήρ· ἐὰν δ' ἐγχείης οἶνον, κατὰ μικρὸν ὁ βότρυν ὕποπερκάζεται καὶ σταφυλὴν τὴν ὁμφακα ποιεῖ. For this sense of δείλῃ δὲ πᾶσα τέμνεται βλαστουμένη ὀπώρα καλῶς κἀνακίρναται ποτόν.

7 βλαστουμένη vix sanum

8 καλῶς ὀπώρα Barnes | κἀκκίρναται A

σταφυλή cf. A. P. 5. 303 διφαζέ οὐκ ἐπένευσε δὲ ἥ σταφυλή, παρεπέμψω κτέ. There does not seem to be any reason for preferring κάπιπερκούται, as suggested by Nauck: in A. P. 11. 36 (quoted on Phoen. Lc.) the conditions are different. In Chaeremon fr. 12 πολλὴν ὀπώραν Κύπριδος εἰσορᾶν παρὴν | ἄκρασι περκάζουσιν οἰνάνθαις χρόνον (γένον conj. Kaibel) the text is corrupt, but the reference is clearly to early maturity.

7 f. βλαστουμένη is generally considered to be corrupt, but no satisfactory emendation has been proposed. Meineke's κλάστον χερὶ ('κλαστουμένη would be better' H. [cf. C. R. xviii 243]: alternatives are τέμνη or μένει, the latter suggested but not approved by Herwerden), which he subsequently gave up in favour of βλαστοῦ γονή | ὀπωροκλάστη κᾶτα, is put out of court by the consideration that an allusion to the vine-dresser's art is irrelevant: not trimming the leaves to let the fruit ripen, but gathering it when ripe is the process to which a reference is required. Barnes's alteration in the order of the words—καλῶς ὀπώρα—is probably right, and the error may be due, as H. thought, to what he called 'simple order' (C. R. xvi 245). On the other hand R. Ellis conjectured ὀπωριαῖος for ὀπώρα καλῶς. But καλῶς itself is not satisfactory, at any rate so long as βλαστουμένη stands: neither Campbell's 'attaining a perfect growth,' nor J.'s 'in its full growth'—lit. 'growing perfectly' can be maintained. Even if the form is legitimate, βλ. ὀπώρα (=the ripe fruit growing) is an odd phrase. The existence of a transitive βλαστῶ is proved by Ap. Rhod. 1. 1131, and that of the passive by Philo's βλος βλαστηθείς (1 667 M.); but the present tense is in any case out of place here. Bergk's ἐβλαστημένη avoided this difficulty. Trach. 703 γλαυκῆς ὀπώρας ὥστε πίονος ποτοῦ | χυθέντος εἰς γῆν Βακχίας ἀπ' ἀμπέλου shows that ποτόν is the juice of the grape, and we should expect to find some allusion not merely to the gathering of the vintage, but to the pouring of the fruit into the vat or its treading by the vintagers. The first requirement would be satisfied by τρογυμένη, the second by τραπουμένη or πατουμένη—or even by βατουμένη (cf. ληροβάτης), the last a word which might possibly have given place to βλαστουμένη, but like τραπουμένη and πατουμένη cannot be combined with τέμνεται. Perhaps τέμνεται, βατουμένης ὅπως ὀπώρας κἀνακίρνηται ποτόν. Observe how easily ὅπως would have been lost, which would lead to subsequent patching. Herwerden proposed βάκχαις for καλῶς on the strength of schol. Hom. N 21 quoted above.

256

πρὸς τὴν ἀνάγκην οὐδ' Ἄρης ἀνθίσταται.

256 Stob. eccl. I 4. 5, p. 71, 20 W. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη. 'πρὸς...ἀνθίσταται' (the lemma is omitted from the proper place by codd. FP of Stobaeus, but given after the conclusion of the following extract). The line is also quoted but with the corruption οὐδεὶς οὐδ' for οὐδ' Ἄρης, in a Paris MS. described by Wilh. Meyer Sitz. d. philol.-philos. hist. Cl. d. k. b. Akad. 1890 II 2, p. 370.

The sentiment follows Simon. fr. 5, 16 ἀνάγκη δ' οὐδὲ θεοὶ μάχονται, O. C. 191 καὶ μὴ χρεῖα πολέμωμεν, Ant. 1106 ἀνάγκη δ' οὐχὶ δυσμαχητόν: see also on fr. 757, 3. The theme is varied here by the introduction of Ares, the embodiment of physical strength: Bacchyl. fr. 36 (20 J.) ἄκαμπτος Ἄρης, Homer's πελώριος, Aesch. fr. 74, Tr. fr. adesp. 129 πολέμοις δ' Ἄρεως κρείσσον' ἔχον δύναμιν. Nauck is probably justified in thinking that this passage is alluded to in Plat. Symp. 196 c καὶ μὴν εἰς γε ἀνδρείαν ἔρωτι οὐδ' Ἄρης ἀνθίσταται.

257

ὥς νυν τάχος στείχωμεν· οὐ γὰρ ἔσθ' ὅπως σπουδῆς δικαίας μῶμος ἄψεται ποτε.

257. 1 ὥς νυν Dindorf: ὡς νῦν SMA 2 ἄψεται ποτε Valckenaer: ἄπεται ποτε SMA

257 Stob. flor. 29. 1 (III p. 626, 6 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Θυέστη. 'ὥς...ποτε.'

1 ὥς νυν, independently suggested by Campbell, seems to be necessary. ὡς τάχος occurs frequently in Sophocles (cf. Phil. 924, O. T. 945, 1154, O. C. 1398, 1461, At. 578, 593), but could not be severed by νυν. On the other hand, ὡς cannot be a final conjunction, since τάχος standing alone is not used adverbially by Sophocles. The arguments for the enclitic are similar to those which have led to its adoption in El. 428, O. C. 465, and elsewhere.

2 For δικαίας F. W. Schmidt conjectured ἀκαίας; but, though at first sight attractive, this alteration really obscures the character of the allusion. The proverb here paraphrased, that hard work brings fame, or that idleness begets disgrace, may be seen in several fragments of Euripides: fr. 134 εὐκλείαν ἔλαβον οὐκ ἀνεν πολλῶν πόνων, fr. 238 οὐκ ἔστιν ὅστις ἡδέως ζητῶν βιοῦν | εὐκλείαν εἰσέκ- τησατ', ἀλλὰ χρή πονεῖν, fr. 237 οὐδεὶς γὰρ ὦν βῆθμος εὐκλεῆς ἀνὴρ, | ἀλλ' οἱ πόνοι τίκτουσι τὴν εὐδοξίαν, fr. 474 πόνος γάρ, ὡς λέγουσιν, εὐκλείας πατήρ. Cf. Theodect. fr. 11 πολλὰ δέ | μοχθεῖν τὸν ἥζοντ' εἰς ἔπαινον εὐκλείως | βῆθμια δὲ κτέ. Herw., who proposed δικαίος or δικαίως, was subsequently inclined to accept the text.—ἄψεται: see cr. n. The future is more idiomatic than the present after οὐκ ἔσθ' ὅπως, unless another negative qualifies the subordinate verb. See Ellendt, s.v. ὅπως, p. 535 a.

258

ἔχει μὲν ἀλγείν', οἶδα· πειρασθαι δ' <ὅμως> [ὥς ῥᾶστα τὰναγκαῖα τοῦ βίου φέρειν]
ἐκ τῶν τοιούτων χρή τιν' ἱασιν λαβεῖν.

258. 1 ἔχειs Itali | ἀλγεῖνδ M, ἀλγεῖν δ A | δ' ὅμως exempli causa scripsi: δὲ χρή MA 2 iure delet Badham ut ex Euripide ortum 3 χρή τὴν MA, δὴ τιν Badham | ἱασιν M

258 Stob. flor. 108. 21 (IV p. 963, 8 Hense) Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη. 'ἔχει... λαβεῖν.' The extract is omitted in S.

Either in the archetype of Stobaeus, or in some older anthology from which it was derived, there has been a confusion of two quotations, which has further led to a corruption of the original text. The extract which follows in Meineke's text (22 = 52 Hense) is taken from Eur. Hel. 253 f. ἔχειs μὲν ἀλγείν', οἶδα· σύμφορον δέ σοι | ὥς ῥᾶστα τὰναγκαῖα τοῦ βίου φέρειν. The sentiment expressed by this couplet, 'what can't be cured must be endured,' recurs in many forms: see the closely parallel words of fr. 585 and cf. Eur. fr. 339, 5 σκαῖον τι δὴ τὸ χρέμα γίγνεσθαι φιλεῖ, | θεῶν ἀνάγκας ὅστις

ἱασθαι θέλει. But the thought of the present fragment—that trouble must be faced, and if possible a remedy discovered—is entirely different: cf. Eur. Or. 398 λύπη μάλιστά γ' ἢ διαφθειροῦσά με | ΜΕ. δεινὴ γὰρ ἡ θεός, ἀλλ' ὅμως ἰάσιμος. The two passages are not consecutive in the MSS, but were so placed by Gaisford. In Hense's text they are separated by a considerable interval. S, which omits the quotation from Sophocles, has γρ. πειρασθαι δὲ χρή written over σύμφορον δέ σοι in Euripides. Apparently the accidental similarity of the opening words tempted someone to combine the two fragments without regard to their inconsistency; and, in order to connect πειρασθαι with the following line, he substituted δὲ χρή for δ' ἔμωσ or δέ σε or whatever the original ending may have been (Blaydes makes the same suggestion). I think it is more likely that χρή arose in this way in v. 1 than that Badham's δὴ τῶν should be accepted in v. 3. F. W. Schmidt followed Badham, and also without necessity gave ἐλκῶν for ἐκ τῶν. Hense thinks that v. 3 alone belongs to Sophocles, and that its context is lost. He formerly conjectured ἐκλυσιν χρήστην for χρή τῶν ἱσίων, thinking that ἐκλυσιν was glossed by ἱσίων: but see Eur. Or. 399 quoted above. ἐκλυσιν was introduced in order to provide a support for ἐκ τῶν τοιούτων, but the latter is perfectly good Greek for 'in such a case.' Cf. Trach. 1109 τὴν γε δρᾶσαν τὰδε | χειρώσομαι κακὴ τῶνδε, 'even as I am.' Ai. 537 τί δὴν' ἂν ὥς ἐκ τῶνδ' ἂν ὠφελοίμιν σε;

259

ἐνεστι γάρ τις καὶ λόγοισιν ἡδονή, λήθην ὅταν ποιῶσι τῶν ὄντων κακῶν.

259 Stob. flor. 113. 12 (IV p. 1015, 5 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Θυέστη. 'ἐνεστι... κακῶν.'

12. These lines refer to the consolation of friends: cf. Aesch. Prom. 394 ὀργῆς νοσοῦσης εἰσὶν ἱατροὶ λόγοι, Eur. fr. 1079 οὐκ ἔστι λύπης ἄλλο φάρμακον βροτοῖς | ὡς ἀνδρὸς ἐσθλοῦ καὶ φίλου παραίνεσις, fr. 1065 λόγοι γὰρ ἐσθλοὶ φάρμακον φόβου βροτοῖς, fr. 962 ἀλλ' ἐπ' ἄλλῃ φάρμακον κείται νόσος | λυπουμένῳ μὲν μῦθος εὐμενῆς φίλων, Tr. fr. adespr. 317 λόγῳ μ' ἐπεισας φαρμάκω σοφωτάτῳ, Menand. fr. 559, III 170 K. λύπης ἱατρός ἐστιν ἀνθρώποις λόγος | ψυχῆς γὰρ οὗτος μόνος ἔχει θελκτήρια κτέ. Consolation was regarded as a formal duty, and the rules to be observed became a branch of casuistry: see n. on Cleanth. fr. 93.—καὶ λόγοισιν. Nauck approves Naber's κἂν λόγοισιν (O. C. 116), a correction anticipated by Wagner; but the text may well be right: cf. El. 369 ὡς τοῖς λόγοις | ἐνεστιν ἀμφοῖν κέρδος.—λήθην: cf. Eur. Or. 213 ὦ πότνια λήθη τῶν κακῶν, ὡς εἰ σοφὴ.—δντων is equivalent to παρόντων: Trach. 330 μὴδὲ πρὸς κακοῖς | τοῖς οὖσιν ἄλλην πρὸς γ' ἐμοῦ λύπην λάβῃ, El. 1498 τὰ τ' ὄντα καὶ μέλλοντα Πελοπαδῶν κακά, O. T. 781 τὴν μὲν οὖσαν ἡμέραν | μόλις κατέσχον, θατέρῃ δ' ἴων κτέ.

260

καίπερ γέρων ὦν· ἀλλὰ τῷ γήρᾳ φιλεῖ
χῶ νοὺς ὁμαρτεῖν καὶ τὸ βουλευεῖν ἃ δεῖ.

260 Stob. flor. 115. 16 (IV p. 1023, 11 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Θυέστη (the name of the play is omitted by S.). 'καίπερ...δεῖ.'

Hyperides (fr. 57 K.) is said to have attributed to Hesiod the line ἐργα νέων, βουλαὶ δὲ μέσων, εὐχαὶ δὲ γερόντων. But more often action and counsel are opposed as the respective provinces of young and old: Paroeni. I 436 νέους μὲν ἔργα, βουλὰς δὲ γεραῖτέροις, Pind. fr. 199 ἐνθα βουλαὶ μὲν γερόντων | καὶ νέων ἀνδρῶν ἀριστεύουσιν αἰχμαῖ, Eur. fr. 508 παλαιὸς ἀνὴρ· ἔργα μὲν νεωτέρων, | βουλαὶ δ' ἔχουσι τῶν γεραῖτέρων κράτος. Cf. Hom. D. 313. Generally, age has a riper intelligence and a wider experience: Diog. L. 4. 50 (Bion) τῇ μὲν ἀνδρεία νέους ὄντας

ἔφη χρῆσθαι, τῇ δὲ φρονήσει γηράσκοντας ἀκμάζειν, Ant. 1353, metr. fr. 664, Antiph. fr. 3 (TGP p. 793), Eur. fr. 619, Phoen. 529 ἡμπεριὰ | ἔχει τι λέξει τῶν νέων σοφώτερον (n.). Hence the rebuke addressed to Creon: O. C. 930 καὶ σ' ὁ πληθύων χρόνος | γέρονθ' ὁμοῦ τίθησι καὶ τοῦ νοῦ κενόν. Contrast fr. 949.—Wecklein conjectured κάστιν γέρων μὲν, but for the παρήχησις see Neil on Ar. Eq. 533, Lobeck on Ai. 384. Ellendt rightly objected to the comma placed by Dindorf after ὦν, as if the participle were structurally related to the following words rather than to the preceding clause. Hense thinks that something like οὐκ ἀτιμὸς ἐστ' ἀνὴρ may have gone before.

261

ἀκήρυκτον

261 Hesych. I p. 97 ἀκήρυκτον· ἄγνωστον. ἀφανὲς δὲ Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη. Cf. Etym. Gud. p. 25, 51 ἀκήρυκτον, ἄγνωστον, ἀφώνον, καὶ μέγα καὶ εὐδιάλλακτον (l. ἀδιάλλακτον). The gloss 'unknown' fits Eur. Hclid. 89 οὐ γὰρ σῶμ' ἀκήρυκτον τῷδε. In Trach. 43 χρόνον γὰρ οὐχὶ βαιὼν... ἀκήρυκτος μένει the meaning is 'without having sent any message' (ἀσημος, οὐ μηνυόμενος ὅπου πῶς) ἐστὶν schol.); and the neuter seems to have been applied similarly to something which had vanished from human ken.

262

ἄλογα

262 Hesych. I p. 130 ἄλογα· ἄρηστα. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη. Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 80, 13=Bekk. anecd. p. 385, 16 ἄλογα· ἄρηστα. Σοφοκλῆς.

There is no other example of ἄλογος in this sense. In Plat. Theaet. 202 B, where the στοιχεῖα, as ἄλογα and ἄγνωστα, are contrasted with συλλαβὰς γνωστάς τε καὶ ῥητάς, the translation inarticulate perhaps comes nearest; and throughout that passage Plato twists ἄλογος to serve his purpose, but without affording a parallel to Sophocles. Cf. ἀφθεγκτος, ἀφώνητος.

263

ἀλωπός

263 Hesych. I p. 136 ἀλωπός· ἀλωπεκώδης, πανούργος. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη Ἰνάχω (fr. 293). οἱ δὲ ἀφανῆς (ἀφανείς cod.) καὶ (del. Blaydes) κατὰ τὴν πρόσοψιν (πρόσωψιν cod.). Cf. Etym. Ad. p. 75, 5 ἀλωπός· ἀλωπεκώδης καὶ πανούργος. οἱ δὲ ἀφελῆς (l. ἀφανῆς) κατὰ πρόσοψιν (so Valckenaer for καὶ ἀπρόσοψις). M. Schmidt, by comparing Eustath. Od. p. 1392, 33 κείται ἐν ῥητορικῇ λεξικῇ (Ael. Dionys. fr. 348 Schw.) ἀλωπός σύνθετος ὁ ἀφανῆς ἢ ὁ τυφλός, showed that the words οἱ δὲ ἀφανῆς κτέ. relate to the lost lemma ἀλωπός. The gloss seems to have been wrongly brought into connexion with ἀλωπός, transferred from its proper alphabetical position, and finally truncated. This may have a bearing on fr. 293. Musurus altered the reference to Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη <καὶ> Ἰνάχω: for M. Schmidt's view see on fr. 419.

Whatever be the right restoration of the corrupt text of Hesychius, it seems certain that in the Thyestes ἀλωπός appeared as an adjective with the meaning 'crafty.' There is hardly any reputable authority for the word either as noun or adjective, but the accent is recorded by Arcad. p. 67, 23. Cobet (N. L. p. 170) showed that ἀλωπόχρους in Bekk. anecd. p. 381, 11 is an error for ἀφωτόχρους. The same mistake occurs in Eustath. Od. p. 1968, 39. The form does not appear to be open to objection on philological grounds: see the list of cognates given by H. D. Darbishire, Rel. philol. p. 92. The corresponding feminine is given by Hesych. as ἀλωπά· ἢ ἀλώπηξ. The cunning of the fox was proverbial ever since Solon's ὁ μέων δ' εἰς μὲν ἕκαστος ἀλώπεκος ἔχρησι βαίνει (fr. 11).

264

ἀνοσήλευτον

264 Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 144, 9 ἀνοσήλευτον. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη.

Presumably the word means 'untended' rather than 'not tainted with disease.'

But for the fluctuating sense of νοσηλεία see Jebb on Phil. 39. For the verb cf. fr. 215.

265

ἀνταΐρουσιν

265 Hesych. I p. 209 ἀντεροῦσιν ἀντιλέγουσι. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη. ἀνταΐρουσιν was restored by I. Voss, and its correctness is proved by the alphabetical order in Hesychius. ἀνταΐρω, which H. once proposed to read in Aesch. Ag. 543 (J. P. XX 299), does not occur in the extant remains of tragedy and is severely limited in its Attic usage. Still there is no reason to discredit the statement of Hesychius, although I have been unable to find any instance where ἀνταΐρω is used of verbal opposition. But Suid. has ἀνταΐρω. δοτική* φιλονεικῶ, and Plut. employs the word metaphorically with considerable freedom: Cat. ma. 3 Σκηπίωνι πρὸς τὴν Φαβίου δύναμιν ἀνταΐροντι, Pyrrh. 15 τόλμη καὶ βίη τῆς ψυχῆς ἀνταΐροντα πρὸς τὴν ἀπορίαν, aud. poet. 9 p. 28 D ἀνταΐρων τῇ τύχῃ.

266

ἀπείρυνας

266 Hesych. I p. 231 ἀπείρυνας ἀπείρατον. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη.

Ellendt strangely remarks that Hesychius 'haud dubie ἀπείραντος intellexit,' and refers to fr. 526. But ἀπείρατος regularly means 'inexperienced,' and ἀπείρων is so used in O. T. 1088 οὐ τὸν Ὀλυμπιον ἀπείρων, ὦ Κίθαιρων, οὐκ ἔση κτέ.

267

ἀπόθεα

267 Hesych. I p. 246 ἀπόθεα. ἄθεα, ἐκτὸς θεῶν. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη.

ἀπόθεα, godless deeds, was a synonym for ἄθεα. Cf. ἀπάνθρωπος, = inhuman, fr. 1020, and Hesych. ἀπόθριξ· ἀνηθός. See also on fr. 558.

268

ἀτελῇ

268 Hesych. I p. 312 ἀτελῇ· ἀδάπανα, οὐκ ἔχοντα τελέσματα. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη. Cf. Pausan. (fr. 305 Schw.) ap. Eustath. Il. p. 881, 26 (= Bekk. anecd. p. 458, 26) ἀτελῇ τὰ ἀδάπανα, ὡς καὶ πολυτελῇ τὰ πολυδάπανα. Suid. s.v.

ἀτελῆς thus becomes the equivalent of εὐτελής, by which a schol. on Phil. 842 wrongly interprets it. Cf. Amphis (fr. 29, II 241 K.) δειπνον γὰρ ἀτελές οὐ ποιεῖ παροινίαν (Plut. Nuim. 15 δειπνον εὐτελές πάνν). It should be added that εὐτελής and ἀτελής are sometimes confused (so Reiske restored εὐτελῶς in Plut. mor. 472 F), and the earlier editors of Athenaeus (421 A) gave εὐτελής in the text of Amphis on inferior authority. Headlam (J. P. XXXI 9) remarked that Horace was rendering ἀτελής in his immanis aram se tetigit manus (Carm. 3. 23. 17).

269

ΕΥΤΕΛΛΩ

269 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 94, 8 ἐντέλλω· ἀντί τοῦ ἐντέλλομαι. Σοφοκλῆς Θυέστη.

The active only occurs elsewhere in

Pind. Ol. 7. 40 μέλλον ἐντειλεν φυλάσθαι χρόος. Sophocles also employs the rare active forms μηχανᾶν (Al. 1037) and ἀτιμᾶν (ibid. 1129).

ΙΒΗΡΕΣ

This title is known from an inscription published by Kaibel in Herm. XXIII 283 (from the papers of Ph. Bonnarot), which records the performance at Rhodes in the third or fourth century B.C. of four Sophoclean plays...ἑὰ Σοφοκλέους καὶ Ὀδυσσέ<α> καὶ Ἰβήρας καὶ σατυρικὸν Τήλε<φον>. The fact of the performance at that place and time is an important record: see Introduction, § 3. The legend of Geryon is the only subject suggested by the title Iberians, but seems more suitable to a satyr-play than a tragedy. For the Geryones of Nicomachus see TGF, p. 762. The Caucasian Iberia, where Heracles overcame Glaus, the Old Man of the Sea (schol. Ap. Rhod. 2. 767), is still less likely.

ΙΝΑΧΟΣ

The story of Io was contained in two epics attributed to Hesiod, the Aegimius and κατάλογοι, but the information relating to them is so scanty that it is impossible to reconstruct either version in detail¹. The other literary evidence anterior to Sophocles consists of the incidents recorded in the Supplices and Prometheus of Aeschylus, to which there is now to be added the dithyramb of Bacchylides (18). In Apollod. 2. 5 ff. we find a version of the story which differs in several respects from Aeschylus, and appears to be founded on Hesiod. Thus we learn that Hesiod made Io the daughter of Peiren,—not of Inachus, as many tragic writers had done. Further, whereas in Aeschylus (Suppl. 303) Hera transformed Io into a cow to thwart the passion of Zeus, according to Hesiod Zeus, after his intrigue was detected, himself effected the change, and Hera, having asked for the cow as a present, set Argus to watch over it. He accordingly tethered Io to an olive-tree in the ἄλσος at Mycenae. There was also a difference of tradition in the accounts given of the death of Argus. In the Prometheus (707) Aeschylus speaks vaguely of his sudden and unexpected end, and in the Suppliants (309) merely states that he was killed by Hermes. According to Apollodorus (2. 7), who appears to be following Hesiod (fr. 189 Rz.), Hermes was bidden by Zeus to steal the cow, and, failing to elude Argus, killed him with a stone. But Ovid's account (Met. 1. 668 ff.) is different: Hermes disguised himself as a shepherd, excited the curiosity of Argus by playing on the pipe, and, when he had eventually succeeded in lulling him to sleep, slew him with the ἄρπη. The antiquity of the latter version is proved by Bacchylides (18. 29—36), who, in refusing to pronounce definitely on the manner of Argus's death, mentions, as an alternative, that he may have been 'lulled to rest by the sweet melody of the Pierian sisters' (see Jebb in loc.).

¹ See the authorities referred to by Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 11309, and in Bursians Jahresb. CXXXVII 516—531.

The inference that the Inachus was a satyr-play was first drawn by Hemsterhuis¹, and the general tone of the fragments has convinced the majority of subsequent critics that he was right, although Bergk² and Wilamowitz³ were of a different opinion. The latter considered that the play was technically a tragedy in spite of its jovial character, and compared it to the Alcestis of Euripides. I doubt if the analogy will hold. The comic element in the Alcestis is slight enough; yet the ancient critics thought it σατυρικώτερον, and the general opinion is summarized by Demetr. de eloc. 169 τραγωδία δὲ χάριτας μὲν παραλαμβάνει ἐν πολλοῖς, ὁ δὲ γέλως ἐχθρὸς τραγωδίας· οὐδὲ γὰρ ἐπινοήσκειν ἂν τις τραγωδίαν παίζουσαν, ἐπεὶ σάτυρον γράφει ἀντὶ τραγωδίας. So much was this the case that Rhinthon of Tarentum, a specimen of whose art is perhaps preserved in the Amphitryo of Plautus, was regarded as the inventor of a new type of drama known as ἱλαροτραγωδία. Wilamowitz has a formidable argument in the fact that twenty-six quotations from the play have come down to us without any hint that it was satyric; and it is perhaps not an adequate answer to point out that the same remark applies to the nine fragments belonging to the Ἀχιλλέως ἐρασταί. But the more famous the play the less need was there to cite it with a title distinctive of its character; and it is common ground that the Inachus was much more popular than any of the plays of Sophocles which are definitely known as satyric⁴. It should be added that the death of Argus is a

¹ On Ar. Plut. p. 248.

² Griech. Literaturgesch. III p. 441.

³ Einleitung in d. gr. Trag. p. 88₆₃. Decharme (Rev. des Ét. gr. XII 298), arguing rightly that a chorus of satyrs was indispensable in a satyr-play, thinks that the Inachus perhaps did not belong to this category.

⁴ I do not feel the force of the argument that frs. 270—1 are unsuitable to a satyr-chorus. Consider, on the other hand, the cumulative force of frs. 272, 277, 279, 284, 285, 288, 291, 295.

favourite subject in vase-paintings, and on one of these Hermes is represented as trying to kill Argus, who is asleep on the ground, but as being held back by satyrs¹. Even if this does not refer directly to the Inachus, it is sufficient to show that the subject was suitable for satyric treatment.

Something may be gathered from the fragments themselves as to the scope of the play. Inachus, the river-god, was the father of Io (frs. 270, 271, 284); but there is nothing to show what part he took in the action. It may be assumed that the scene of the play was the flowery vale of Argos, rich with pasture, where Io ranged before her wanderings began: cf. El. 5 τῆς οἰστροπλῆγος ἄλσος Ἰνάχου κόρης. Aesch. Suppl. 538 ἀνθο-
νομους ἐπωπᾶς, | λειμῶνα βούχιλον, ἐνθεν Ἴω κτέ. This description of the Argive plain (πολυδίψιον: see generally Frazer Pausan. III p. 96) might well excite surprise; but Headlam has pointed out that it refers to the particular circumstances of the legend, by quoting Severus in Walz, Rhet. Gr. I p. 537 τιμῶσα ἡ γῆ τὴν τοῦ Διὸς ἐρωμένην ἀνθος ἀνήκε τῇ βοὶ νέμεσθαι. It is perhaps not altogether fanciful to connect the allusion of the rhetorician with the account given in the Inachus of the blessings bestowed on the inhabitants of Argos when Zeus came to visit Io (frs. 273, 275, 277, 286). To Inachus in particular, as the source of nourishment for all the dwellers on his banks (Aesch. fr. 168, Tucker on Aesch. Cho. 6), the increase of fertility brought enlarged honours. Hermes and Iris appeared as the agents of Zeus and Hera (fr. 272),—themselves too august personages for stage representation. The transformation of Io² took place during the course of the action (fr. 279), but whether as a direct result of Hera's interference must be left doubtful. Wilamowitz argues from frs. 278, 284, and 286 that Hera effected a counter-stroke by reducing the land to poverty as a punishment for the complicity of its inhabitants in the wrong done to her. Argus was introduced blowing the shepherd's pipe (fr. 281); and this reference, taken in conjunction with Aesch. Prom. 596 and the allusion in Bacchylides to the fatal issue of his musical tastes, favours the inference that his death was brought about somewhat in the manner related by Ovid. The play probably closed with the departure of Io on her wanderings. Wilamowitz assigns the play to the end of the Archidamian war, presumably on the strength of schol. Ar. Av. 1203.

¹ Described by O. Jahn in Berichte d. sächs. Gesellsch. d. Wissensch. 1847, p. 296. See Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 392.

² The fragments do not show whether she was completely transformed; but, if she appeared afterwards, it must have been as βούκερως πάρθενος (Engelmann in Roscher II 271).

270

Ἰναχε νᾶτορ, παῖ τοῦ κρηνῶν πατρὸς Ὠκεανοῦ, μέγα πρεσβεύων Ἄργους τε γῆαις Ἦρας τε πάγοις καὶ Τυρσηνοῖσι Πελασγοῖς.

270. 1 νᾶτορ Meineke: γεννάτορ A, ^{γεν}νᾶτορ B 4 Τυρσηνοῖσι schol. Ap.
Rhod.: Τυρρηνοῖσι codd. Dion. Hal.

270 These lines are adduced by Dionys. Hal. Ant. Rom. i. 25 Σοφοκλεῖ δ' ἐν Ἰνάχῳ δράματι ἀνάπαιστον ὑπὸ τοῦ χοροῦ λεγόμενον πεποίηται ὧδε Ἰναχε... Πελασγοῖς in support of the proposition that the name of Tyrrhenia was in former times distributed over different parts of Greece. V. 4 is quoted by schol. Ap. Rhod. i. 580 οἱ δὲ καὶ αὐτοὶ οἱ Ἄργεοι ἐκαλοῦντο Πελασγοὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰνάχῳ φησὶ καὶ T. Πελασγοῖς.

1 f. Ἰναχε: for the course of the river Inachus see on fr. 271.—νᾶτορ: in support of his correction Meineke (on Callimachus, p. 250) quotes Hesych. iii p. 137 νᾶέτωρ βέων, πολύρρους, and p. 141 νᾶτταρέων πολύρρους (i.e. νᾶτωρ βέων, πολύρρους). Empedocles fr. 6 introduces Νῆσσις as the representative of Water in his list of the four elements. Cf. νᾶ fr. 5.—τοῦ κρηνῶν πατρός. Cf. Hom. Φ 196 Ὠκεανοῖο, | ἐξ οὗπερ πάντες ποταμοὶ καὶ πᾶσα θάλασσα | καὶ πᾶσαι κρήναι... νᾶουσιν. Ar. Nuib. 271. The rationalizing version is given by Apollod. 2. 1 Ὠκεανοῦ καὶ Τηθύος γίνεταί παῖς Ἰναχος, ἀφ' οὗ ποταμὸς ἐν Ἀργεὶ Ἰναχος καλεῖται.—πρεσβεύων (At. 1389), followed by Homeric (perhaps locative) dative (Monro, H. G. § 145, 7).

3 Ἦρας τε πάγοις: 'alluding to the Argive Heraeum, which stood on a rocky eminence under Mt Euboea, one of the heights which bound the Argive plain on the E. (El. 8 n.)' J. But, as Hera was the patron goddess of all Argos (Eur. Hclid. 349, Phoen. 1365 etc.), it is perhaps unnecessary so to restrict the plural πάγοις. Poseidon sent a drought, being angry with Inachus, διότι τὴν χώραν Ἦρας ἐμαρτύρησεν εἶναι (Apollod. 2. 13). See also Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 1829.

4 Τυρσηνοῖσι Πελασγοῖς. J. writes: 'As we know from Dionysius, it is the Chorus who speak. They would be Argives, and here speak of their own race, with pride, as sprung from the ancient stock of the Pelasgi. Cp. Thuc. 4. 109, who traces a Pelasgic element in the Athos peninsula, descended from τῶν καὶ Ἀθηναίων ποτε καὶ Ἀθήνας Τυρσηνῶν οἰκησάντων. In the fifth century the view prevailed that the Τυρσηνοὶ and Pelasgi were identical. [In Hdt. i. 57 τοῖσι νῦν ἐστὶ Πελασγῶν τῶν ὑπὲρ Τυρσηνῶν Κρηστῶνα πόλιν οἰκούντων, Κρότωνα, i.e. Cortona—with Κροτωνιῆται for Κρηστωνιῆται below—should perhaps be substituted: see Stein.] Hellenicus (fr. 1, FGH i 45) says that the Pelasgi acquired the name of Τυρσηνοὶ after their arrival in Italy. The Etruscans were believed to have come originally from Lydia (Hdt. i. 94). Herodotus (8. 73) regards the people of Cynuria in the S. of Argolis as having been originally Pelasgic. So the inhabitants of Achaia, he says, were originally called Pelasgi, and acquired the name of Ionians only after they left it. In Arcadia the first king was Pelasgus (Pausan. 8. 1. 4). The evidence which connects the Pelasgian name with Argos is particularly strong, and is difficult to account for as due merely to a mistaken interpretation of Homer's Πελασγικὸν Ἄργος (B 681): see nn. on Eur. Hclid. 316, Phoen. 107. Aeschylus in the Danaides (fr. 46) traces the Pelasgians to the neighbourhood of Mycenae, and in the Suppliants (257 ff.) Pelasgus is the king of Argos after whom the inhabitants are named Pelasgi. See Ridgeway, Early Age of Greece, pp. 90, 94. It is impossible within the limits of a note to summarize recent speculation concerning the Pelasgians and Tyrrhenians, and the relations of both to the Etruscans. Those who identify Pelasgi and Tyrseni explain the latter name as a descriptive epithet referring to the towers with which they protected their settlements (Murray, Rise of Greek Epic, p. 41). Ridgeway, on the other hand, regards Tyrrhenian Pelasgians as those Pelasgians who having lived with the Tyrrhenians (Etruscans) had been more or less influenced by them (l.c. p. 146). Skutsch (in Pauly-Wissowa VI 730 ff.) considers the identity of the Tyrseni and Etrusci to be established beyond dispute, and that the latter reached Italy from the East by sea; but he also denies that they have any connexion with the Pelasgians, holding that they were a non-Greek seafaring folk, who occupied settlements on the islands and the coasts of the mainland. See also Holm, Greek History, Eng. tr. I p. 60 f., who accepts the view that the importance of the Pelasgians has been much exaggerated, and that their influence was confined to Epirus and Thessaly. J. L. Myres in JHS XXVII 215 traces the application of the name Pelasgian to Peloponnesian Argos to a misinterpretation of the Πελασγικὸν Ἄργος of Homer. Further, inasmuch as the names Pelasgian and Tyrrhenian were recognized in the fifth century as somehow or other connected (Thuc. l.c.), the latter in close association with the former acquired a general connotative sense of 'pre-Hellenic in the Aegean.'

271

ῥεῖ γὰρ ἀπ' ἄκρας
Πίνδου Λάκμου τ' ἀπὸ Περραιβῶν εἰς Ἀμφιλόχους καὶ Ἀκαρνανας,

271 Strabo 271, after speaking of the legend which identified the Syracusan Arethusa with the Alpheus, continues: τὰ γε προειρημένα ἀδύνατα καὶ τῷ περὶ τοῦ Ἰνάχου μύθῳ παραπλήσια· ῥεῖ... Πίνδου φησὶν ὁ Σοφοκλῆς Ἀλάκμου... Ἀχελῷον καὶ ὑποβάς ἔνθεν... Αἰρκέου. βελτίων δ' Ἐκαταῖος (fr. 72, FHG I 5), ὅς φησι τὸν ἐν τοῖς Ἀμφιλόχοις Ἰναχον ἐκ τοῦ Λάκμου ρέοντα, ἐξ οὗ καὶ ὁ Ἄλας ρεῖ, ἕτερον εἶναι τοῦ Ἀργολικοῦ.

J. writes: 'The river Inachus in Epeirus is here fabled to be identical with the Inachus of Argolis, being connected with it by a submarine (and subterranean) channel. (1) The Epeiroi Inachus rises "from the (northern) extremity of Pindus, and Lacmos." Mt Lacmos, or Lacmon, the great watershed of northern Greece, is in the NE. of Epeirus. It is a link between the Cambrynian mountains on the E., and Pindus on the S. "Lacmon," probably = "rifled," being akin to λάκκος, "a hollow," and λaxis, "a rent" (Tozer, p. 52), referring to the deep valleys which cleave the range.

The Inachus rises in Lacmon; and its valley runs south, roughly parallel with Pindus. It flows through the highland country of the Perrhaebi—an Epeiroi branch of the tribe who gave the name of Perrhaebia to a district of Hestiaeotis in N. Thessaly. It skirts the territory of the Amphilocheian Argos, at the E. end of the Ambracian Gulf, sending out branches, on one of which stood the town of Argos, and then, near the NE. border of Acarnania, it flows into the Achelous, which, rising, like the Inachus, in Lacmon, divides Acarnania on the W. from Aetolia on the E., and flows into the sea at the SW. extremity of Acarnania, near Oeniadae. [For Achelous, see on Tr. 9.]

(2) The Argive Inachus rises in the highlands between Argolis and Arcadia, one part of which was called Artemision, and another Lyrceion. It flows through the district belonging to the town of Lyrceia (about seven miles NW. of Argos), which is fittingly named in the text as being the first place of note in Argolis traversed by the river.'

2 ἀπό does not suffer anastrophe (Chandler, §916).—Περραιβῶν is partitive genitive after Ἀλάκμου: 'and from Lacmos in the Perrhaebi.' In prose the article would be required with Περραιβῶν: Kuehner-Gerth I 338.

3 Ἀμφιλόχους. The name is traced to Amphilocheus, son of Amphiarus and brother of Alcmaeon. Thucydides (2.68) refers the foundation of this Western Argos to Amphilocheus after his return from Troy; but Ephorus (FHG I 240) said that it was founded by Alcmaeon after the expedition of the Epigoni, and named after his brother, and that the river which flows through the country into the Ambracian gulf was called Inachus at the same time (Strabo 325). This is the branch mentioned above.

μίσγει δ' ὕδασιν τοῖς Ἀχελώου

ἐνθεν ἐς Ἀργος διὰ κύμα τεμῶν ἦκει δῆμον τὸν Λυρκείου.

5

271. 5 ἐνθενδ' eis (és) codd.
Hesych. III p. 57

6 Λυρκείου Tyrwhitt: Λυρκίου codd. et

4 μίσγει is intransitive, for it is very improbable that ῥόας or the like occurred in the following verse, which Strabo omits. It is, then, another instance of the tendency shown by Greek verbs expressing motion to become intransitive: see n. on Eur. Hel. 1325 ῥίπτει δ' ἐν πέτρῃ | πέτρῃ κατὰ δρία πολυνυφέα. Add πάλῳ (Eur. El. 435 etc.), ἐμβάλλῳ, ἰάπτῳ (Aesch. Suppl. 556); and for Latin examples see Munro on Lucr. 3. 502. — Blomfield, reading καὶ <γῆν> ὑποβάς, made the quotation from Soph. continuous, but ὑποβάς clearly belongs to Strabo.

5 διὰ κύμα τεμῶν: for the tmesis see on fr. 799, 6.

6 Λυρκείου. The hero's name was Lyncus, and he is described either as a son of Abas (Pausan. 2. 25. 5), or of Lyncus (Hesych. s.v. Λυρκίου δῆμον). There is another Lyncus also connected with Argos, and mentioned in Parthen. 1, where he is called son of Phoroneus. Pausanias l.c. calls the place Lyrceia, and says that it was deserted as early as the time of the Trojan expedition; hence J. would prefer the adjective Λύρκειον here. But the name Λύρκειον is supported by Hesychius and Strabo (376), both of whom state that the township and the mountain were called by the same name. No doubt Λύρκειον was strictly the name of the mountain, and the site of the village having no separate name was known as δῆμος Λυρκείου or ἡ Λυρκεία. — J. quotes Aesch. fr. 196 ἦξει δῆμον ἐνδικώτατον... Γαβίου.

272

γυνὴ τίς ἦδε συληνας Ἀρκάδος κυνῆ

272 συληνας (συληνάς VN)R, κυληνάς Ald., alii alia | κυνῆς Toup

272 Schol. Ar. Av. 1203 κυνῆ δὲ οὗτις ἔχει περικεφαλαίαν τὸν πέτασον ὡς ὁ Ἑρμῆς ἄγγελος ὢν παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἰνᾶχῳ ἐπὶ τῇ Ἰριδος (so R as reported by Rutherford, but other edd. attribute the addition of ἐπὶ τῇ Aldus). 'γυνή... κυνῆ.' (R is illegible after 'Ἀρκάδος.') It is evident that this is the passage referred to by Hesych. I p. 282 Ἀρκὰς κυνῆ· Ἀρκαδικὸς πῖλος. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰνᾶχῳ, as restored by Scaliger for ἀρκασκύνῃ· ἀρκαδικὸς πῖλος from Eustath. II. p. 302, 27 ἐν τοῖς Πανσανίου (fr. 72 Schwabe) φέρεται οὗτις Ἀρκὰς κυνῆ ἐλέγετο τις ἦτοι Ἀρκαδικὸς πῖλος, διὰ τὸ ἔχειν ὡς εἰκόσ τι διάφορον πρὸς τὰ ὁμοειδῆ. Hence Soping corrected Hesych. I p. 270 ἀρασύνῃ· πύελος τοῦ Ἀρκὰς κυνῆ· πῖλος.

It is to be feared that this cryptic utterance cannot be restored in the present state of the evidence. Brund and Dindorf accept Toup's κυκλὰς Ἀρκάδος κυνῆς, which may be taken in two ways:

(1) κυκλὰς may be substantival with the sense of 'brim' (so Toup): 'there's a round Arcadian hat.' (2) κυκλὰς may be an adjective, 'encompassed' or 'covered.' Neither supposition is quite satisfactory. Nauck prints γυνὴ τίς ἦδε γυνάς; Ἀρκάδος κυνῆ from his own conjecture, which I do not understand; but there is something to be said for his remark that Ἀρκάδος κυνῆ ought rather to be Ἀρκὰς ἢ κυνῆ. F. W. Schmidt proposed γυνὴ τίς ἦδ'; οὐχ Ἑλλάς; or γυνὴ τίς ἦδ' οὐχ Ἑλλάς; against the evidence of the scholiast. R. Ellis conjectured γυνὴ τίς; ἢ Κυλληνίς Ἀρκάδος κυνῆ; Κυλληνίς is an attractive suggestion, but no reading will be satisfactory which does not put Ἀρκὰς (or Ἀρκάδος) in agreement with κυνῆ (or κυνῆς). That is demanded by the gloss of Hesychius, and is an essential condition of the problem. Blaydes conj. στεγανὸς Ἀρκάδος κυνῆς. Further, it may be inferred from Ar. Av. 1205 ὄρομα δὲ σοὶ τί ἔστι; πλοῖον ἢ κυνῆ; and from the interpretation of the scholiast that both in Sophocles and in Aristophanes Iris appeared on the stage in a broad-brimmed hat, similar to that worn by Ismene in O. C. 313 κρατὶ δ' ἡλιοστερῆς | κυνῆ πρόσωπα Θεσσαλὶς νυν ἀμπεχεῖ. Such a head-gear, a travelling hat for a journey, would be appropriate to Iris in her capacity of messenger, being a variety of the πέτασος which was worn by Hermes: see Guhl and Koner, p. 171. If we might assume that κυνῆ was no part of the original text, it would be possible to read τίς ἦδε σὺλῆσάσ' αὖ Ἀρκάδος κυνῆς; as if Hermes resented the appropriation of his own emblem. For the connexion of Hermes with Arcadia see Hom. h. Herm. 2 etc. M. Mayer in Roscher II 346 thinks that the schol. was altogether wrong in referring to the πέτασος, and that a high-crowned hat with side-flaps is meant (Hesych.'s πῖλος is right). But he goes farther, and supposes that Ἰριδος was an error for Ἰοῦς, and that Hermes alluded to the horns growing from Io's head: so he would introduce σελήνη or σεληνίς, but failed to fit it to the verse. Rutherford emended as follows: γυνή τις ἦδε; <..... τίς εἶ> σὺ; ληνίς Ἀρκάς ἢ κυνῆ; 'who are you? An Arcadian Bacchante or a sun hat?' He held that γυνή τις ἦδε belonged to a separate line, and that the note originally referred to vv. 1199-1203. For ληνίς he quotes Suid. ληνίς, ληνίδος. ἡ βάκχη· παρὰ τὸν ληνόν. Hesych. III p. 35 ληνά· βάκχαι. Ἀρκάδες. Εἰγμ. Μ. p. 564, 4 ληνίς· σημαίνει τὴν βάκχην. He is thus able to take Ἀρκάς with both substantives. ληνίς is certainly ingenious, but the supposed lacuna and the explanatory addition of the adjective are less satisfactory. It is also difficult to appreciate the resemblance supposed to exist between ληνίς and κυνῆ.

273

Πλούτωνος ἡδ' ἐπέισδος

273 ἡδ' Porson: δ' codd.

273 Schol. Ar. Plut. 717 τὸν Πλούτων Πλούτωνα εἶπε παῖζων· ἡ δὲ καὶ Πλούτωνα αὐτὸν ὑποκαριστικῶς ἐκάλεσεν (Nauack conj. ἐκάλουν, but the scholiastic ἡ δὲ is simply attached to Πλούτωνα, and the subject to ἐκάλεσεν is the speaker), ὡς Σοφοκλῆς Ἰνᾶχων· Πλούτωνος δ' ἐπέισδος· καὶ πάλιν· τοιοῦδ'...χάρων' (fr. 283).

Pluton is here introduced simply as the bestower of wealth (a by-form of Πλούτος), and the allusion is to the coming of Zeus. For the form see Usener, Götternamen, p. 16, who compares Ζάν: Ζεύς and Ποσειδών: Ποσειδᾶς. Zeus is thus the giver of wealth: cf. Suid. s.v. Ζεὺς κτήσιος· ὃν καὶ ἐν τοῖς ταμείοις ἰδρύντο ὡς πλουτοδότην. Pluton is to be regarded rather as the attendant minister of Zeus, than as a title applied to him. The cult of Plutus-Pluton was particularly associated with that of Demeter at Eleusis: Farnell, III pp. 137, 281.

The giving of the name Pluton to Hades is euphemistic (cf. Plat. Crat. 403 A καὶ φοβούμενοι τὸ ὄνομα [sc. Ἄιδης] Πλούτωνα καλοῦσιν αὐτόν), and comparatively late (no earlier instance than Ant. 1200 is quoted); and even when so applied the consciousness of its real signification remained (Ar. fr. 488, I 517 K. καὶ μὴν πόθεν Πλούτων γ' ἀνώνομάζετο, | εἰ μὴ τὰ βέλτεσσ' ἔλαχεν). Whether the transference was made in view of the wealth stored beneath the earth (Cic. n.d. 2. 66 terrena autem vis omnis atque natura Diti patri dedicata est, qui Dives, ut apud Graecos Plouton, quia et recidunt omnia in terras et oriuntur e terris. Plat. Lc. τὸ δὲ Πλούτωνος, τοῦτο μὲν κατὰ τὴν τοῦ Πλούτου δόξαν, ὅτι ἐκ τῆς γῆς κάτωθεν ἀνίσταται ὁ Πλούτος, ἐπωνομάσθη. Lucian Tim. 21, where Plutus is speaking: ὁ Πλούτων ἀποστέλλει με παρ' αὐτοῦς, ὅτε πλουτοδότης καὶ μεγαλόδωρος καὶ αὐτὸς ὦν· δῆλοϊ γούν καὶ τῷ ὀνόματι), or whether it was ironically applied to the god who, notwithstanding the extent of his power (Cornut. 5 καὶ Πλούτων δὲ ἐκλήθη διὰ τὸ πάντων φθαρτῶν ὄντων μηδὲν εἶναι δ μητελευταῖον εἰς αὐτὸν κατατάττεται καὶ αὐτοῦ κτῆμα γίνεται), is only the lord of unsubstantial shadows (cf. O.T. 30, with Jebb's n.), cannot be determined. Birt's derivation (Archiv f. lat. Lexicogr. xi 165) from πλου-τ-ῶν, 'the place of the majority,' is improbable. But Plutus and Pluton soon became completely differentiated, and the name Pluton as the wealth-giver failed to survive as an independent personification. The earlier freedom is illustrated by Aesch. Prom. 831 οὐ χρυσόρυτον | οἰκοῦσιν ἀμφὶ νῆαυα Πλούτωνος πόρον. It is in relation to the gold-mines of Spain that Strabo 147 quotes a remarkable passage of Posidonius: οὐ πλουσία μόνον ἀλλὰ καὶ ὑπόπλουτος ἦν, φησὶν, ἡ χώρα: καὶ παρ' ἐκείνοις ὡς ἀληθῶς τὸν ὑποχθόνιον τόπον οὐχ ὁ "Αἰθῆρ ἀλλ' ὁ Πλούτων κατοικεῖ. And he goes on to say that in the Attic mines men work so zealously, ὡς ἀν' προσδοκῶντων αὐτὸν ἀνδ'· ξεῖν τὸν Πλούτωνα—to bring the wealth-god himself to the surface.

H. quotes from the lines on the εἰρεσιώνη attributed to Homer (v. 3) αὐταὶ ἀνακλινεσθε θύρας· πλοῦτος γὰρ ἐσείσιν | πολλός (Suid. s.v. "Ομηρος, [Hdt.] vit. Hom. 33).

Blaydes would prefer ἡδ' ἐστ' εἰσοδος, comparing fr. 275.

274

πανδόκος ξενόστασις

274 Pollux 9. 50 μέρη δὲ πόλεως καὶ πανδοκίον καὶ ξενῶν καὶ ὡς ἐν 'Ἰνάχῳ Σοφοκλῆς, πανδόκος ξενόστασις.

These words are simply the tragic periphrasis for an inn, and the anachronism is noteworthy. Cf. Aesch. Cho. 657 ὦρα δ' ἐμπόρους μεθίεναι | βγκυραν ἐν δόμοισι πανδόκοις ξένων, id. 708 ἀγ' αὐτὸν εἰς ἀνδρῶνας εὐξένους δόμων. In O. C. 90 ξενόστασις = shelter.

275

[τοῦ Διὸς εἰσελθόντος πάντα μεστὰ ἀγαθῶν ἐγένετο.]

275 Schol. Ar. Plut. 807 σικυή ἡ ἀροτήκη ταῦτα δὲ παρὰ τὰ (πρὸς τῷ [τὸ] V) ἐν 'Ἰνάχῳ Σοφοκλέους, ὅτε (ὅτι V) τοῦ Διὸς εἰσελθόντος πάντα μεστὰ ἀγαθῶν ἐγένετο. Ar. Plut. 806 f. are as follows: ἡ μὲν σικυή μεστή 'στι λευκῶν ἀλφίτων, | οἱ δ' ἀμφορῆς οἶνον μέλανος ἀνθοσμίου.

The word παρὰ is used in scholia much in the same way as a modern commentator would say 'compare (confer).' Thus it is employed as well when it is desired to illustrate a single phrase (schol. Aesch.

Prom. 7, comparing Hom. I 212), as when two longer passages are compared (schol. Soph. El. 95, comparing Hom. λ 408 ff.). Here there is a comparison of the whole description in the two plays (cf. fr. 273); but we need not infer that Aristophanes was closely imitating or parodying the language of Sophocles. Blaydes conj. Πλούτων for Διὸς referring to fr. 273, but Pluton was introduced in the course of the description of the wealth which followed the coming of Zeus.

276

σιροὶ κριθῶν

276 Schol. Demosth. p. 182, 17 (on 8. 45) σιροῖς] τὰ κατάγεια, Θεόπομπος καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν 'Ἰνάχῳ 'σιροὶ κριθῶν.'

σιροί, underground pits used for the storage of grain and fodder (ὀρύγματα, ἐν οἷς κατετίθετο τὰ σπέρματα Phot., Suid.). Hence Spanish silo (through Lat. sirius) and our ensilage. Bent, Cyclades, p. 454 f. refers to the practice as still prevailing in the island of Ceos: see also Sandys on Dem. l.c. Ammonius ap. Etym. M. p. 714, 20 testifies that the ι was short in Attic; and his statement is confirmed by Eur. fr. 827 καὶ μὴν ἀνοῖξαι μὲν σιροῖς οὐκ ἤξιον, and by Anaxandrides fr. 40, 27 (11 152 K.) κέρχων τε χύτραν, | βολβίων τε σιρὸν δωδεκάπηχυν, | καὶ πολυπύδων ἐκατόμβην.

277

ξανθή δ' Ἀφροδισία λάταξ
πᾶσιν ἐπεκτύπει δόμοις.

277. 2 πασιν ἐπεκτύπει codd.: corr. Heath (πᾶσιν) et Nauck¹, ἐπικτυπεῖ Meineke

277 Athen. 668 B τῶν ἐρωμένων ἐμέμνητο, ἀφίεντες ἐπ' αὐτοῖς τοὺς λεγομένους κοσσάβους. διὸ καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰνάχῳ Ἀφροδισίαν εἶρκε τὴν λάταγα· ξανθή... δόμοις.

The chief authorities for the game cottabus are Athen. 665 E—668 F, schol. Lucian Lexiph. 3, schol. Ar. Pac. 343 (= Suidas s.v. κοτταβίζειν), schol. Ar. Pac. 1242, 1244. From these it appears that the members of the συμπόσιον were accustomed to regard the game as a love-oracle, and that the successful player, whether his success was measured by the clearness of the sound proceeding from the splash of the falling wine itself, or from the clatter of the πλάστιγξ descending upon the head of the μάνης (fr. 537), by the retention of all the wine in the πλάστιγξ, or by the sinking of the largest number of his ἐρωμένη. Hence the epithet Ἀφροδισία.—λάταξ is obviously used of the drops of wine thrown by the players, not, as L. and S. appear to imply, of the game itself. Athenaeus cites in the same connexion Eur. fr. 631 πολλὸς δὲ κοσσάβων ἀραγμός | Κύπριδος προσώδον ἀχέ | μέλος ἐν δόμοις, and Callim. fr. 102 πολλοὶ καὶ φιλέοντες Ἀκόντιον ἦκαν ἔραζε | οἶνοπόται Σικελὰς ἐκ κυλίκων λάταγας.—ξανθή describes the red glow of the wine, as it sparkles in the light. But the poet was not thinking of red wine, as contrasted with white; still less could the word signify a light-coloured (yellow) wine, in comparison with a darker shade. That ξανθός in certain respects answers to our use of red may be deduced not only from Antipater of Sidon's ξανθὸν ἐρεῖσθαι (A.P. 12. 97) of a handsome boy, but also from its application to horses, lions, and oxen, and especially to fire (this is the point of Pindar fr. 122 αἶθε τὰς χλωρὰς λιβάδων ξανθὰ δάκρυα | θυμῶτε, and fr. 79^b αἰδομένα δὲ ὅς ἐσθ' ὑπὸ ξανθαῖσι πεύκαις). When Simonides applies it to honey (fr. 47), he is thinking rather of the brightness than of the actual colour of the liquid.—ἐπεκτύπει: see cr. n. H. points out that a similar error συνκῦπτει for σύν κτύπῳ occurs in Aesch. Cho. 23.

Meineke inferred that the passage formed part of a description of general festivity, and of the joys consequent upon a state of peace. His reading ἐπικτυπεῖ was intended to balance βριθεῖ in fr. 286, which he believed to belong to the same context. He well points out that the converse case—the abandonment of the festive sport on an outbreak of war—is described in a fragment of Hermippus (fr. 47, I 237 K.): ῥάβδον δ' ὄφει τὴν κοτταβικήν | ἐν τοῖς ἀχύροισι κυλινδομένην, | μάνης δ' οὐδὲν λατάγων αἰεὶ κτέ.—For the metre of the first line see At. 399, O.C. 210.

278

εὐδαίμονες οἱ τότε γέννας
ἀφθίτου λαχόντες [θείου]

278. 1 γέννας Bergk: γενεᾶς codd.

2 θείου del. Herwerden

278 Schol. V Ar. Pac. 531 Σοφοκλέους μελῶν | ὅτι ἡδέα τὰ μέλη Σοφοκλέους περιέργως δὲ τινὲς εἰς τὰ ἐν τῷ Ἰνάχῳ περὶ τοῦ ἀρχαίου βίου καὶ τῆς εὐδαιμονίας· εὐδαίμονες...θεῖον. The first line is also quoted by Philodem. de piet. p. 51 G

<τῆς ἐπ> ἰ Κρόνου ζω <ῆς εὐ> δαιμονεστά· <τῆς οὐσ> ῆς, ὡς ἔγραψεν Ἄν· Ἡσί> οὐδός καὶ ὁ τὴν <Ἀλκμ> εὐνίδα ποή> σας καὶ > Σοφοκλῆς <εὐδαίμο> νες οἱ τότε <γέννας> εἰπόν.

The allusion is to a belief in a Golden 280

βοῦ

280 Antiatt. (Bekk. anecd.) p. 84, 18 βοῦ ἀντί τοῦ βοός. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰνάχῳ. Choerob. in Theod. p. 237, 8 [= 234, 36 Hilgard] εὐρέθη τοῦ βοῦς ἡ γενικὴ οὐ μόνον βοός, ἀλλὰ καὶ τοῦ βοῦ παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἰνάχῳ καὶ παρὰ τῷ Αἰσχύλῳ (fr. 421). The same extract occurs in Herodian II 704, 39.

βοῦ is formed directly on the analogy of νοῦ, for βο : and νοῦς (from νόος) were pronounced with the same vowel sound (ā) in the fifth century. See Brugmann, *Gr. Gram.*³ p. 52; G. Meyer, *Gr. Gram.*⁵ § 322; Lobeck, Paralip. p. 173.

281

[Ἄργος πανόπτης ἄδων βουκολεῖ τὴν Ἰώ.]

281 Schol. Ar. Ecc. 80 τοῦ πανόπτου] τοῦ τὴν Ἰώ φυλάττοντος· αἰνίττεται δὲ ὡς ὄντος αὐτοῦ (sc. τοῦ λαμίου) δεσμοφύλακος· ἀναφέρει δὲ τούτων ἐπὶ τὸν παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἰνάχῳ Ἄργον. The lines of Aristophanes are: νῆ τὸν Δία τὸν σωτήρ' ἐπι-τῆδεὺς γὰρ ἦν | τὴν τοῦ πανόπτου διφθέραν ἐνημμένος, | εἴπερ τις ἄλλος, βουκολεῖν τὸ δῆμον (τὴν Δημῶ conj. von Velsen). On v. 81 the schol. continues: βουκολεῖν δὲ ὡς τὴν Ἰώ δ' Ἄργος ἐν Ἰνάχῳ Σοφοκλέους. From this we should infer that Argus in the distinctive dress of a herdsman appeared to attend Io in the Inachus. In Aesch. Prom. 596 Io fancies she still hears the pipe of Argus: ὑπὸ δὲ κηρόπλαστος ὀτορεῖ δόναξ | ἀχέτας ὑπνοδόταν νόμον, and the schol. remarks: Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰνάχῳ καὶ ἔδοντα αὐτὸν εἰσάγει· εἰπὼν δὲ αὐτὸν 'βοῦταν' (v. 590) ἐνέμεινε τῇ τροπῇ· ἀλλοῦσι γὰρ ἐπόμενοι τοῖς ποιμνίοις οἱ βουκόλοι. Thus Argus chanted an ode in Sophocles; but in Ōv. Met. I. 676 ff. it was Hermes who with his shepherd's pipe lulled Argus to sleep.

282

ἐπήνεσ'· ἴσθι δ', ὥσπερ ἡ παροιμία, ἐκ κάρτα βαιῶν γνωτὸς ἂν γένοιτ' ἀνήρ.

282 Stob. flor. 46, 13 (IV p. 199, 6 Hense) Σοφοκλέους ἐν Ἰνάχῳ· 'ἐπήνεσ'... ἀνὴρ.' The extract is given by S, but omitted by MA. The second line is quoted by Apostol. 6, 88a without the author's name.

We cannot discover the form in which the proverb was current, but its general character is reflected by such passages as Aesch. Cho. 261 ἀπὸ σμικροῦ δ' ἂν ἄρειας μέγαν | δόμον, or Ar. Av. 799 εἴτ' ἐξ οὐδενός | μεγάλα πράττει. The following proverbs are applied to the parvenu: Diogen. I. 94 ἀπὸ βραδυσκελῶν θυμὸν ἔκπρος ὠρονσεν· ἐπὶ τῶν ἀπὸ εὐτελῶν μὲν, ἐνδόξων δὲ γενομένων ἐκείνων (cp. Zenob. 2, 5), Diogen. I. 98 ἀπὸ κώπης ἐπὶ βῆμα· ἐπὶ τῶν ἀπὸ χειρόνων εἰς κρείττονα, combined with ἀνίπτοις ποσὶ by Syrian. ad Hermog. IV p. 40 Walz οἱς ἦν δ' τε ἀπὸ τῆς κώπης ἀνίπτοις ποσὶ κατὰ τὴν παροιμίαν ἐπὶ τὸ βῆμα πηρόσας Δημάδης. Cf. Isocr. 5, 89 συνέτεσεν ἐξ ἀδόξων μὲν γενέσθαι λαμπροὺς ἐκ πενήτων δὲ πλουσίους, ἐκ ταπεινῶν δὲ πολλῆς χώρας καὶ πόλεων δεσπόταις. Dem. 18, 131 ἐλεύθερος ἐκ δούλου καὶ πλοῦσιος ἐκ πτωχοῦ διὰ ταυτοῦσι γεγονώς. On the strength of such analogies Blaydes (on O. T. 454) proposed βαιοῦ in place of βαιῶν, and by his n. on ibid. 750 suggested that βαιῶν was masc. But there can be no doubt that it is neuter ('from small beginnings'): cf. Phil. 720 ἐβδαίμων ἀνύσει καὶ μέγας ἐκ κείνων.—ἴσθι is followed by an independent clause without ὅτι. Cf. Plat. apol. 20 D εὐ μέντοι ἴστε, πᾶσαν ἡμῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν ἐρῶ. A collection of similar examples is given by Jacobs, Antimach. in Athen. [supplement to Schweighäuser's ed.] 1809, p. 271.—ὥσπερ ἡ παροιμία occurs in Aesch. Ag. 276, Eur. fr. 668.—κάρτα: qualifying the adj., as in Trach. 1218 εἰ καὶ μακρὰ κάρτ' ἐστίν, ἐργασθήσεται, but not so clearly in the other examples given by Ellendt s.v.—γνωτὸς: fr. 203.

283

τοιόνδ' ἐμόν Πλούτων' ἀμεμφείας χάριν

283 ἀμεμφείας codd.

283 Schol. Ar. Plut. 727 is quoted on fr. 273.

In the absence of the context it does not seem worth while to throw suspicion on the text, although several scholars have condemned τοιόνδ' or ἐμόν or both. Thus Hemsterhuis conjectured τοιάνδ' ἐμοί, Fritzsche τοιόνδ' ἔχω, and Bergk τοιάνδ' ἐμοί Πλούτων—the last to the detriment of the caesura. But with such an addition as γεγώτ' ἀπαιτεῖν the traditional words might stand. I have, however, restored ἀμεμφείας for ἀμεμφίας, which is a questionable form. ἀμεμφεία is required by the metre in Aesch. Theb. 893, and it is improbable that so rare

a word would (like ἀμαθία, εὐτυχία, or προμηθία) follow the -ο- stems. That the forms in -ια are due to Ionic influence is an error: see Weir Smyth, Ionic Dialect, §§ 145, 215.—ἀμεμφείας χάριν may be rendered provisionally as 'meed of praise,' although it is equally possible that χάριν is a preposition. The use of ἀμεμφείας, where a word of positive import might have been expected, is characteristically Greek. Thus Menelaus, transported with joy at the recovery of Helen (Eur. Hel. 636): ὦ φιλότατη πρόσωψις, οὐκ ἐμέμφθην. Other examples are quoted in the n. on Eur. Phoen. 425.

284

πατήρ δὲ ποταμὸς Ἴναχος
τὸν ἀντίπλαστον νόμον ἔχει κεκμηκότων.

284. 2 ἔχει νόμον cod.: corr. Porson, νομόν ἔχει Ellendt

284 Hesych. I p. 214 ἀντίπλαστον. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰνάχῳ 'πατὴρ...κεκμηκότων,' ἀντὶ τοῦ ἰσόπλαστον, ὅμοιον.

J. writes: '(1) Ellendt (s.v. κάμνω) understands, similem inferis sedem (νομόν) habere. "Inachus has a province (or realm) similar to that of the dead." ἀντίπλαστον (τῶν) κεκμηκότων = τοῦ τῶν κεκμ. (like ὅμοιος with gen.). This might refer to the passage of Inachus under the earth from Acarnania to Argolis (fr. 271). (2) With νόμον we might explain: "Inachus has a customary tribute like that paid to the dead": cp. Aesch. Cho. 6 πλόκαμον Ἰνάχῳ θρεπτήριον, [τὸν δεύτερον δὲ τόνδε πενθητήριον—where the same comparison between the mourning lock and the nurture lock is involved, as also in Il. Ψ 141 f.;] and for offerings of hair to the dead, see on Ai. 1173 ff.' Wilamowitz understands a reference to the parched condition of Inachus in consequence of Hera's wrath ('Inachus selbst ward fast zu einer trocknen Mumie'): see Introductory Note. Tucker (C.R. xvii 190) proposed to read τόδ' ἀντίπλαστον ὄνομ' ἔχει, i.e. 'has this name (peculiarly) constructed to signify weariness—as if the name were derived from ἴνα and ἄχος. In reference to this conjecture it should be observed that Inachus was traditionally connected with the proverbial Ἰνοῦς ἄχῃ, a view which is favoured by some modern authorities (Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 134712). Fick connected the word with the Hesychian gloss ἰνάσαι· καταχέαι, and χέω, and others have thought that it contained the root of aqua (cf. Achelous, Acheron): so Waser in Pauly-Wissowa VI 2791.

ἀντίπλαστος resembles in its formation ἀντίγραφος, ἀνταμοιβός, and ἀντίμμος (explained as = ὅμοιος by the schol. on Ar. Thesm. 17).

285

ναρὰς χυτρίνων ἐκροὰς ἐπώμοσα.

285 καὶ σασχυτρίνων cod. : corr. Lehrs (ναρὰς) et Stadtmueller (χυτρίνων)

285 Herodian περὶ μὲν λέξ. p. 35, 9 (II p. 940 Lentz) τὰ γὰρ εἰς πρὸς δισύλλαβα, τῷ α παραληγόμενα, ὀκνόμενα μὲν ἔχει ἐκτενόμενον τὸ α, ψαρὺς, λαρός· ἐνθεν θηλυκὸν παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἰνάχῳ καὶ σασχυτρίνων (so Egenolff reports: the edd. give σασχυτρίνων) λαρός ἐστα· ἐπὶ κύμα ἐκ ροᾶς ἐπώμοσα λαρός ἀνὴρ. ἐνθεν τὸ οὐδέτερον, 'λαρὸν τετυκοίμεθα δόρπον' (μ 283). βαρυνόμενα δέ, εἰ καὶ ἀρσενικά ὑπάρχοι ἢ θηλυκά, συστέλλειν θέλει τὸ α, 'λάρω ὀρνιθὶ ἐοικώς' (ε 51).

The puzzle is to extract from this the words of Sophocles. Dindorf conjectured that καὶ σασχυτρίνων was a corruption of σατυρικῶς, and this was accepted by Lehrs, who altering λαρός after ψαρὺς to ναρὸς held that λαρός was not introduced until the words λαρός ἀνὴρ, and converted the latter to λαρός ἀμης. The intervening words λαρός...ἐπώμοσα form the quotation from Sophocles; and were restored by Lehrs as ναρὰς τε πατρὸς κυμάτων ἐπὶ ροᾶς | ἐπώμοσα. Few will approve Schneider's modification (Callim. II 756): 'Ὡ δὲ ναρὸς εἴτ' ἐπὶ κύμασιν ροᾶς | ἐπώμοσα. Both conjectures are a long way from the traditional text, but the introduction of ναρὸς (see on fr. 621) is an attractive suggestion. H. writes: 'The proposition which Herodian is supporting is that when dissyllables in ᾠρὸς are accented oxytone, the α is long; whereas, when they are paroxytone, the α is usually short. And the Homeric examples bear this out: for in the one case the complete line is νῆσῳ ἐν ἀμφιρότῳ λαρὸν τετυκοίμεθα δόρπον; whereas the complete line in the other case is σεύατ' ἔπειτ' ἐπὶ κύμα λαρῷ ὀρνιθὶ ἐοικώς. Now, it appears to me that the latter part of λαροσεύατ' ἐπὶ κύμα is merely a corruption of σεύατ' ἔπειτ' ἐπὶ κύμα, jotted down by some reader in the margin and afterwards transcribed in the wrong place. Supposing this to be so, we are left with παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ ἐν Ἰνάχῳ καὶ σασχυτρίνων λαρο...ἐκροὰς ἐπώμοσα.

The term χυτρίνοι was applied sometimes to pot-like cavities in which springs rise, or pot-like holes in rivers; see Hesych. s.νν. χυτρίνοι and λίθων χοαί, Antig. mirab. 176, Arrian I p. 291 Mueller, which are all quoted at full length in the Thesaurus. But we cannot read καὶ οὖς χυτρίνων ἐκροὰς ἐπώμοσα, because it does not illustrate Herodian's point. There was, however, this word, as well as the adjective χυτρίνος, to account for a scribe writing χυτρίνων by error; and the error would be easy if, as I suggest, he found ΧΥΓΡΑΙΝΩΝ or ΧΥΓΡΥΝΩΝ, i.e. χ' ὑγραίνων or χ' ὑγρούνων. My suggestion is that we have here two fragments,—one, ΚΑΙΓΑΡΧΥΓΡΑΙΝΩΝ, that is, καὶ σάρχ' ὑγραίνων λαρόν (cf. Eur. fr. 367), which just meets the case, giving both the long α and the feminine,—and another one which does the same, λαροὺς ἐκροὰς ἐπώμοσα. Whether both are from the Inachus, or only one, and if so, which, I shall not attempt to decide; but perhaps the first may have been the work of a later hand.' It will be observed that this suggestion had been partially anticipated by Stadtmueller, who, as reported by Egenolff in Rh. Mus. LVI 288, restored πάσας χυτρίνων ἐκροὰς ἐπώμοσεν | λαροὺς ἀνὴρ, i.e. omnes foraminum exitus clausit vir dulci imbutos sapore, and cut out the words ἐστα· ἐπὶ κύμα as interpolated from Hom. ε 51. He explained χυτρίνων by reference to the underground course of the Inachus (fr. 271, 5). The suggestion that ἐστα· ἐπὶ κύμα is an interpolation deserves acceptance and with it might go λαρός (before ἐστα·). λαρός ἀνὴρ (after ἐπώμοσα) probably has nothing to do with Sophocles. If, then, following Lehrs, we assume that ναρὸς has dropped out before ἐνθεν θηλυκὸν and substitute ναρὰς for καὶ σασ..., the result is the text, which, however doubtful, yields an appropriate sense.

πάντα δ' ἐρίθων ἀραχνῶν βρίθει.

286 Suid. s.v. ἀράχνη (Bekk. anecd. p. 442, 5)...εἰρηται δὲ ἀράχνης καὶ παρ' Ἡσιόδῳ (Op. 777) καὶ παρὰ Πινδάρῳ (fr. 268) καὶ παρὰ Καλλίῳ (II 694 K. καλλίοις in Bekk. anecd.: 'debebat παρὰ ἄλλοις' Nauck)...θηλυκῶς δὲ Σοφοκλῆς 'Ἰνάχῳ' 'πάντα...βρίθει.'

When the gear of war is covered with cobwebs, it is a sign of profound peace: the earliest extant expression of this sentiment is in Bacchyl. fr. 3, 6 J. ἐν δὲ σιδεροδέτοις πόρπαξιν αἰθῶν | ἀραχνῶν ἱστοὶ πέλονται. Cf. Eur. fr. 369 κείσθω δόρυ μοι μίτον | ἀμφιπλέκειν ἀράχνης. Theocr. 16. 96 ἀράχνια δ' εἰς ὅπλ' ἀράχναι | λέπτα δαστήσαντο, Nonn. 38. 13 (quoted by Smyth) ἐκεῖτο δὲ τηλόθι χάραξ | βακχίᾳς ἐξαστήρος ἀραχνιώσσα βοεῇ. Cf. Tibull. 1. 10. 50 occubat in tenebris militis arma situs. For English imitations see Smyth on Bacchyl. l.c., Headlam, Book of Greek Verse, p. 276. Meineke, accordingly, substituted πέλτα for πάντα, and is followed by Nauck. But this is surely hazardous; for even granting that the reference is to warlike instruments, πάντα may have been explained by the preceding words. And the presence of the spiders' webs may equally well be a sign of decay in general. Cf. Hom. π 34 Ὀδυσσεὺς δὲ πον εὐνή | χῆρτε ἐνευναίων κάκ' ἀράχνια κείται ἔχουσα, imitated by Prop. 3. 6. 33 putris et in vacuo laxetur aranea lecto. Indeed, if we connect the line with frs. 273, 275, 276, the words are entirely in point as describing the emptiness of the storehouses, which the sudden advent of Wealth will fill again: so Hes. Op. 475 ἐκ δ' ἀγγείων ἐλάσειας ἀράχνια, Afran. 410 lanime arcula tua plena est araneorum, Plaut. Aul. 84 itu inanitis sunt oppleae (sc. aedes) atque araneis, Catull. 13. 7 tui Catulli plenus sacculus est araneorum. Cratinus makes a ludicrous application of the idea: fr. 190 (II 71 K.) ἀραχνίων μεστήν ἔχεις τὴν γαστέρα. It appears again in an elaborate description by Philostratus of a painting of a spider's web (imag. 2. 28. 1): οἰκίας μὲν οὐκ εὖ πραττοῦσης προπόλαια ταῦτα, φήσεις αὐτὴν χρεῖν δεσποτῶν...ἀλλ' ἔστιν οἰκητὸς ἀράχνης μόναις· φιλεῖ γὰρ τὸ ζῶον ἐν ἡσυχίᾳ διαπλέκειν. And in the same passage is an imitation of Sophocles (§ 3): αἱ δ' ἐρίθοι δι' αὐτῶν βαδίζουσι τείνουσαι τοὺς κεχαλασμένους τῶν μίτων.—Blaydes calls attention to the fact that βρίθω is usually accompanied by the dative. But he should not have conjectured βρῖναι: for Homer's authority (i 219, etc.) is sufficient justification, apart from the analogy of the verbs with similar meaning.

ἐπίκρουμα χθονὸς Ἀργείας

287 Hesych. II p. 158 ἐπίκρουμα· ἐπιπλήγμα ἢ ἐπιχάραγμα. διὰ τὸ παρωνομάσθαι τῷ ἔργῳ 'ἐπίκρουμα...Ἀργείας.' Σοφοκλῆς 'Ἰνάχῳ.

παρωνομάζειν means 'to form a new word from one already existing.' This appears clearly from Dem. de eloc. 97 παρὰ τὰ κείμενα παρωνομάζοντα αὐτόν, οἷον ὡς τὸν σκαφίτην τις ἔφη τὸν τὴν σκάφην ἐρέσσοντα, καὶ Ἀριστοτέλης τὸν αὐτίτην οἷον τὸν μόνον αὐτὸν δοῦναι: see also Rutherford, Annotation, p. 23973. For the dative cf. Plut. de fort. Rom. 5 p. 318 F τῇ τύχῃ τὴν ἀνδρείαν παρωνόμασεν, schol. Ar. Plut. 590 δὲ δὲ ἀνελευθεροῦ κακία παρωνόμασται τῇ ἀνελευθερίῳ. Hesych. asserts that ἐπίκρουμα is a new formation from ἐπικρούω, intended to express the action of striking. The words of S. mean therefore 'the beating of Argive earth' or possibly 'the solid ground that is struck.' Cf. Aesch. Ag. 202 χθόνα βάκτροις ἐπικρούσαντας Ἀτρεΐδης. This is substantially the same as Ellendt's view, who thinks the reference is to striking with a stick or to dancing. Tucker, who takes the view that ἐπίκρουμα means reproach, prefers τῷ ἄργῳ: i.e. Ἀργὸς is supposed to be derived from ἀργός 'idle.' Bergk restored the text of Sophocles as ἐπικρούμ' Ἀργον χθονὸς Ἀργείας, understanding ἐπίκρουμα as the impression of a coin.

He accepted Toup's 'Ἀργῶ for ἔργῳ (also approved by M. Schmidt) and supposed that the words διὰ τὸ... 'Ἀργῶ originally followed the quotation as an explanation of 'Ἀργέας.

In view of Eur. El. 180 ἐλκτὸν κρούσω πῶδ' ἐμὸν, I. A. 1042 χρυσοσάνδαλον ἔχρος ἐν γὰρ κρούουσαι, and perhaps of Her. 1304, it is open to doubt whether the traditional explanation of Ar. Thesm.

120 Λατὼ τε κρούματά τ' Ἀσιάδος ποδὶ παράρθμ' εὐρύθμα Φρυγίων | δινεύματα Χαρίτων is correct. If κρούματα are the beats of the foot in dancing, Ἀσιάδος would naturally mean the land of Asia; and the interpretation of the scholia might have been due to κίθαριν in the response of the chorus, which however was the usual accompaniment of the dancers. Cf. Pollux 7. 88.

288

κναμόβολον δικαστήν

288 κναμοβόλως δικαστήν cod.: corr. Musurus, κναμόβολον (pro κναμοβόλον) Brunck

288 Hesych. II p. 544 κνάμω πατρίω Σοφοκλῆς Μελεάγρῳ (fr. 404), ὡς καὶ τῶν Αἰτωλῶν τὰς ἀρχὰς κναμενόντων. διεκλήθρον δὲ αὐτὰς κνάμω καὶ ὁ τὸν (δταν cod.) λευκὸν λαβὼν ἐλάγχανεν. ἀνάγει δὲ τοὺς χρόνους, ὡς καὶ ἐν Ἰνᾷ 'κναμοβόλως δικαστήν' (κναμοβόλῳ δικαστῇ Schow, κναμοβόλῳ σε δικαστήν, conj. Nauck).

The meaning of the words is not entirely free from doubt owing to the scantiness of our information respecting the method of appointing dicasts in the fifth century. It seems certain, however, that κναμοβόλος cannot refer to the voting of the dicasts, as there is nothing, except the very questionable statement in the scholia to Eq. 41, to indicate that they ever recorded their votes by using beans; and the positive information touching χαίρειναι (Ar. Vesp. 333, etc.) is definitely against any such hypothesis. We must therefore assume that κναμόβολος is right and refers to the appointment of dicasts by lot; and that at some time or other beans were used for the necessary balloting, as is well known to have been the case with the κληρωταὶ ἀρχαί (Gilbert, Staatsalt. 1 p. 242). In order to check the increasing evil of bribery, the method of appointment was changed from time to time, and we know little or nothing about the system in vogue during the middle of the fifth century; thus the evidence of Ar. Plut. 277 as to balloting for a particular court only affects the period subsequent to Euclides. Arist. Ath. pol. 27. 4 seems to show that a yearly ballot was held for admission to the heliastic list of 6000, but by what method those who succeeded were afterwards subdivided into separate panels cannot be determined (Gilbert, p. 441f.; Lipsius, p. 136; Thalheim in Pauly-Wissowa V 567). Ar. Eq. 41 κναμοστρώξ Δῆμος alludes to the use of beans in election to office, but its point is said to have been partly derived from the fact that the dicasts chewed beans when sitting in court in order to ward off sleep and keep their wits sharp (Ar. Lys. 537, 690 with the scholia). For the anachronism see At. 1135, 1285 (Jebb's nn.).

289

χειμῶνι σὺν παλινσκίῳ

289 Harpocr. p. 143, 9 παλινσκίον... Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰνᾷ 'χειμῶνι σὺν παλινσκίῳ' ἀντὶ τοῦ ζοφερῶ. Phot. lex. p. 374, 11 and Suid. παλινσκίον... καὶ Σοφοκλῆς 'χειμῶνι παλινσκίῳ.' Phot. lex. p. 373, 25 and Suid. παλινσκίῳ σκοτεινῶ. Bekk. anecd. p. 294, 6 παλινσκίον τὸ ὑποσκιαζόμενον ὑπ' ἄλλου.

The example is quoted by the lexicographers in order to show that πάλιν in composition is sometimes employed with intensive force (Hesych. III p. 261 παλινσκίος· σύσκιος, σκοτεινός, ζοφώδης· τὸ γὰρ πάλιν ἐνιαχοῦ ἐπίτασιν δηλοῖ). Suidas refers to παλιγκάπηλος and παλινμῆρης as parallel; but there the idea of repetition is prominent, as also in παλιμῆρης. — Naber needlessly conjectured λειμῶνι.

290

Γῇ μήτηρ θεῶν

290 Philodem. de piet. p. 23 καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐ<ν> Ἰνά<ω> χωρὶς τὴν γῆν μ<ητέ>ρα τῶν θεῶν φη<σιν>, ἐν Τριπολιτέμ<ω> δὲ καὶ Ἑστίαν (fr. 615) εἰν<αι>.

According to the Hesiodic Theogony (v. 45) Gaia and Uranus are the parents of the gods, and this tradition is carried on in Hom. h. 30. 17 χαῖρε, θεῶν μήτηρ, ἄλοχ' οὐρανοῦ ἀστερόεντος, Solon fr. 36. 2 μήτηρ μεγίστη δαιμόνων Ὀλυμπίων. Cf. Orph. h. 26. 1 Γαῖα θεά, μήτηρ μακάρων, θνητῶν τ' ἀνθρώπων. In spite of some development of her cult at Athens, Ge never became a divine personality so distinct as to sway the hearts or imaginations of the Greeks: see Eitrem in Pauly-Wissowa VII 478. In Phil. 391 δρεστέρα παμβῶτι Γᾶ, μήτηρ αὐτοῦ Διός, her identification with Rhea, who in Hes. Theog. 470 is her daughter, is implied. Cf. Chrysipp. II 1084, 1085 Arn. The introduction into Greece of the Phrygian cult of Rhea-Cybele, Mother of the Gods, is assigned to the fifth century: cf. Strabo 469 Ῥέαν μὲν καὶ αὐτοὶ τιμῶσι καὶ ὀργιάζουσι ταύτῃ, μητέρα καλοῦντες θεῶν. In Eur. Hel. 1302 Demeter is called the mother of the gods, and is clearly, as the sequel shows, identified with Cybele. On the other hand, Demeter has many affinities with Ge: for the evidence see Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 1166. It should be added that, although the identification of the Mother of the Gods with Rhea-Cybele is extremely common, there is reason to believe that there was also an indigenous Greek cult, recognized in the title given to the Metroon at Athens, of a goddess known simply as μήτηρ θεῶν (Hom. h. 14). But there is nothing to connect her directly with Ge. Whether Sophocles here followed the Hesiodic tradition, or, as in the Philoctetes, meant to describe Rhea-Cybele, it is impossible to determine.

291

ἀναιδείας φάρος

291 Hesych. I p. 173 ἀναιδείας φάρος πίων Σοφοκλῆς Ἰνάχω· παρὰ τὸ (Hom. B 262) χλαῖνάν τ' ἡδὲ χιτῶνα, τὰ τ' αἰδῶ ἀμφικαλύπτει.

φάρος may signify any covering, as in Trach. 916, where it is applied to bed-wrappings. For the shortening of the α in Sophocles see on fr. 360. The mysterious word πίων has not been elucidated: Junius conj. χιτῶν, Salmasius ποιόν (to be taken with φάρος), M. Schmidt παίρων or παρὰ Ἰωνί. One might suppose that the ἀναιδεία which required a cloak was that of the satyrs (cf. fr. 360).

292

ἀελλόθριξ

292 Hesych. I p. 54 ἀελλόθριξ· ποικιλόθριξ, ἢ πυρεωροῦς καὶ συνεχεῖς ἔχουσα τὰς τρίχας, παρὰ τὴν ἀελλαν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰνάχω.

It is not possible to believe that ἀελλόθριξ meant 'with hair floating in the wind,' as in O.C. 1261 κόμη δὲ αὔρας ἀκένυστος φέσσεται. I should rather suppose that it affords an instance of comic hyperbole, in the sense of 'with disordered hair'; in that case we might correct

Hesych. to παρηόρους (Palmerius and Toup) καὶ <οὐ> συνεχεῖς, 'straggling and not closely braided': cf. Plut. qu. conv. 4. 2. 4 p. 666 A ἐδοτον γέγονε καὶ συνεχὲς αὐτῷ καὶ πυκνὸν τὸ ἴδιον. [I have since found that this suggestion has been anticipated by Herwerden in Mélanges Weil, p. 182, who rightly prefers the form παρεώρους. Similarly R. Ellis, who proposed ἀσυνχεῖς.]

293

ἀλωπός

293 See on fr. 263. As the text of Hesychius stands, it would seem that ἀλωπός occurred both in the Thyestes and in the Inachus. It is, however, not unlikely that the lemma ἀλωπός, which has undoubtedly disappeared, was taken from the Inachus, and that the words ἀλωπός· Σοφοκλῆς have been omitted after Θυέστη. See also on fr. 419.

294

ἄναια

294 Hesych. 1 p. 178 ἄναια· ἀνωφερῆ, ὑψηλά. τινὲς δὲ τὰ μὴ βεβεργεμένα. Σοφοκλῆς δὲ Ἰνάχῳ τὰ μὴ κεκομμένα (κεκωλυμένα cod.: corr. Salmasius). παρὰ τὸ αἰνεῖν (αἰνεῖν cod.), ὃ ἐστὶ κατακόπτοντα πτίσσειν (πῆσιν cod.). Phot. ed. Reitz. p. 116, 18 has the same gloss with the addition of δυσχερῆ after ὑψηλά, and with ἐκκεκομμένα for κεκομμένα. The lemma of course related primarily to Hom. Ψ 116, and Photius adds that Aristarchus read ἄναια there: cf. Eustath. Il. p. 1191, 45.

The rare verb αἰνεῖν is known principally as occurring in the proverb μολγὸν αἰνεῖν, of an impossibility. The reference here is perhaps to grain which did not require winnowing: cf. frs. 273, 275. In place of Salmasius's κεκομμένα Tucker would prefer ἐσκολυμμένα, comparing fr. 423. But the text is clearly right: cf. Hesych. 1 p. 335 ἀφῆνα· ἔκοψα, II p. 281 ἦνας· ἔκοψας.

295

κημός

295 Schol. Ar. Eq. 1150 κημός ὁ ἐπὶ τοῦ καθίσκου, εἰς ὃν τὰς ψῆφους καθίσταν τοῖς δικαστηρίοις. Κρατύνος δὲ αὐτὸν ἐν Νόμοις (fr. 132, 154 K.) 'σχολοῖνον ἡθμὸν' καλεῖ· τοιοῦτος γὰρ ἐγένετο καὶ ἦν παρόμοιος χῶρη, ὡς καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰνάχῳ.

This surely implies that Sophocles described the κημός as funnel-shaped. Cf. Pollux 8. 123 κάδον, ᾧ κημός ἐπέκειτο, δι' οὗ καθίετο ἡ ψῆφος. In the later days of the κύριος and ἀκυρος ἀμοφορεύς, the corresponding part was called ἐπίθημα διερρι-νημένον (Arist. Ath. pol. col. 36, 8). There is some doubt whether the shape of the κημός was intended to secure secrecy, since in the fifth century the voting may have been open: see Starkie on Vesp. 987, and on the other side Gilbert, Staatsalt. 1 461. But, apart from this, there were obvious advantages in the bottle-necked opening. The word occurs in another sense in fr. 504. The allusion to the ballot-box no doubt occurred in the neighbourhood of fr. 288.

ΙΞΙΩΝ

The only evidence of the existence of this play is the quotation of a single word from it by two scholiasts not ultimately independent of each other. As Aeschylus undoubtedly wrote under this title, Welcker (p. 402) suggests not unreasonably that the reference to Sophocles may be an error (see Introduction, § 1). The subject, however, was a favourite one; and plays bearing the name Ixion were composed also by Euripides, Callistratus (CIA II 972, 15), and Timesitheus (Suid. s.v.).

296

δίψιον

296 Schol. Apoll. Rhod. 4. 14 παρά τὸ ἔψαι Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰξίονι δίψιον φησὶ τὸ βεβλαμμένον. Schol. Hom. Δ 171 in Cramer, anecd. Par. III p. 162, 25 ἢ βλαβερὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ ἰψιον ἢ παρά τὸ ἔψαι. Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰξίονι (ἐν ἱερῶν cod. Par.) δίψιον κατὰ πλεονασμὸν τοῦ δ δίψιον ἄγχι βεβωλημένον. Nauck at one time thought that the last three words were a quotation from some epic poet, but afterwards recognized that Papageorgius had rightly proposed to substitute for them δίψιον φησὶ τὸ βεβλαμμένον, omitting the former occurrence of δίψιον.

Notwithstanding the absurdity of the etymology, it is quite conceivable that δίψιον may have been so used that βεβλαμμένον, i.e. 'checked,' appeared to be a suitable gloss for it. Thus in Aesch. Cho. 184 ἐξ ὀμμάτων δὲ δίψιον πίπτουσι μοι | σταγόνες ἀφρακτοί, whether translated 'scant' or 'thirsty,' the reference seems to be to the tears which refuse to flow in measure corresponding to the inner emotion (see Verrall); and the schol. has ποθεῖναι μοι· πρόην ἀρεστοί. Hesych. I p. 523 has δίψαι· βλάψαι, which M. Schmidt supposes to be a fiction of the Alexandrian poets, δίψιον· βλάπτικον, possibly with reference to the present fragment, and δίψιον Ἄργος... ἢ ὑπὸ Διὸς βεβλαμμένον· ἔψαι γὰρ τὸ βλάψαι. Cf. Etym. M. p. 279, 55 δίψα· παρά τὸ ἔπτω τὸ βλάπτω, ἔψα καὶ δίψα, ἢ βλάπτουσα τὸ σῶμα. Etym. Gud. p. 148, 25.

IOBATHES

The famous story of Bellerophon appears first in Hom. Z 155—202, where, however, Iobates is not mentioned by name. Welcker (pp. 416—418) identified the plot with part of the narrative extracted from Asclepiades (FHG III 303) by the schol. on Hom. Z 155 ὁ δὲ Προΐτος αὐτόχειρ μὲν οὐκ ἐβουλήθη τὸν Βελλεροφόντην ἀποκτείνειν, πέμπει δὲ αὐτὸν εἰς Λυκίαν πρὸς τὸν πενθερὸν Ἰοβάτην, ἀδοκῆτως καθ' ἑαυτοῦ κομίζοντα γράμματα. ὃ δὲ πολλοῖς αὐτὸν ἐγγυμνάσας ἄθλοισι, ὡς οὐκ ἔωρα φθειρόμενον, ὑπετόπησε τὴν κατ' αὐτοῦ στρατηγηθεῖσαν δεινὴν καταβουλήν· τοσοῦτον γὰρ κακῶν ὄχλον τῇ δυνάμει κατηγωνίσατο. ἔδωκε δὲ αὐτῷ πρὸς γάμον τὴν ἰδίαν θυγατέρα Κασάνδραν καὶ τῆς βασιλείας μοῖραν τινα. This is a plausible enough guess, but has no other foundation than the presumption afforded by the title that the action of the drama took place in Lycia. When Welcker proceeds to assume that the play opened with the return of Bellerophon from the last of his trials, i.e. the λόχος of Z 189, he is on very insecure ground. Euripides wrote two plays on the subject, the Sthenoboea (TGF p. 567) and the Bellerophon (ib. p. 443). The scene of the former must have been Tiryns, and in the latter the attempt to ascend to Olympus and the subsequent misfortunes of the hero were described. The adventures in Lycia are related without any variation of substance by Apollod. 2. 30—33, Hygin. fab. 57, and several other authorities; but it is worthy of mention that Hyginus makes the betrothal of Bellerophon to the daughter of Iobates subsequent to the fall from Pegasus. We are certainly not compelled to assume that the treatment of Sophocles was so distinct from that of Euripides as to ignore the ὑβρις of Bellerophon, which Pindar discreetly veiled in Ol. 13. 91, but condemned unhesitatingly in Isth. 7. 44 ff.: τὸ δὲ παρ δίκαν | γλυκὺ μικροτάτα μένει τελευτά.

297

καὶ νῶν τι σῆμα λαμπρὸν ἐνδείξαι βίου

297 Lex. Messan. f. 281 r. νῶν (νῶι cod.: corr. Rabe) ἔχει τὸ ἰ ὡς καὶ τὸ σφῶν... Σοφοκλῆς Ἰοβάτη (ιοκ. στη cod., as deciphered by Rabe. A tragedy by Sophocles entitled Iocasta is of course incredible). 'κα<ι> νῶν...βίου.'

Nauck doubts if the text is sound, and the meaning is not clear. Blaydes well conjectures σχῆμα for σῆμα: cf. Ant. 1169 καὶ ζῆ τύραννον σχῆμ' ἔχων.

298

τὸν Ἀΐδαν γὰρ οὐδὲ γῆρας οἶδε φιλεῖν.

298 Stob. flor. 119. 6 (IV p. 1076, 1 Hense) | Σοφοκλέους Ἰοβάτου. 'τὸν... φιλεῖν.' The extract appears in A only of Hense's MSS, being omitted by SM.

H. thought that γὰρ was due to an attempt to make an iambic line out of an apparently unmetrical quotation: see On editing Aeschylus, p. 121. Hence he suggested τὸν <δ'> Ἀΐδαν | οὐδὲ γῆρας οἶδε φιλεῖν, with glyconic rhythm [cf. J. W. White in C. Q. 111 293]; or else that something has been lost after τὸν Ἀΐδαν γὰρ ~ ~ ~. F. W. Schmidt defends his τὸν Ἀΐδην γὰρ οὐδ' ὁ γηραιὸς φιλεῖ by quoting Eur. fr. 936, but Sophocles has no other example of Ἀΐδης in iambics. Hence Blaydes improves it to τὸν μὲν γὰρ αἰδῆν κτέ., but the change is much too violent, even if it is necessary to alter the text at all.

The thought that the old cling to life more than the young is a commonplace: see fr. 66. Eur. Alc. 669 μάτην ἄρ' οἱ γέροντες εὐχονται θανεῖν, | γῆρας ψέγοντες καὶ μακρὸν χρόνον βίου. | ἦν δ' ἐγγὺς ἔλθῃ θάνατος, οὐδεὶς βούλεται | θνήσκειν, τὸ γῆρας δ' οὐκέτ' ἔστ' αὐτοῖς βαρύν. Alexis fr. 235, 11 383 K. τὸν γὰρ ὄστατον | τρέχων διαυλον τοῦ βίου, ζῆν βούλομαι. Aesop's fable of the old man and the bundle of faggots is to the same effect (Aesop. fab. 90 Halm). Arist. rhet. 2. 13. 1389^b 37 καὶ φιλόζωοι καὶ μάλιστα ἐπὶ τῇ τελευταίᾳ ἡμέρᾳ.

299

ἀφύλλωτον πέτραν

299 Hesych. I p. 341 ἀφύλλωτον πέτραν· ἀπορον (ἀφορον Τουρ, ἀσπορον M. Schmidt), ἀενδρὸν, οἷον λεωπετρίαν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰοβάτη.

A bare rock without any sign of vegetation may be either a sheer precipice or a peak rising above the snow-line: cf. Aesch. Suppl. 802 ἡ λισσὰς ἀγέλιψ ἀπρόσ- | μεικτος οἰφρων κρεμάς | γυπιάς πέτρα. Contrast Eur. Her. 790 Πυθίου δένδρῳ πέτρα, —of the pine-woods on Parnassus. For ἀφύλλωτος see on fr. 249.

ΙΠΠΟΝΟΥΣ

Hipponous, King of Olenus in Achaia¹, finding his daughter Periboea to be with child, sent her across the straits to Oeneus at Calydon in Aetolia, bearing a secret message that she is to be made away with. Such was the account of Hesiod (fr. 97 Rz.), who makes her ravisher Hippostratus son of Amarynceus. It will be noticed that here Oeneus—apparently as dwelling in a remote and uncivilized corner of Greece—takes the place assigned to Nauplius in the stories of Aerope and Auge. According to others, Oeneus himself was the father of the child to whom Periboea afterwards gave birth, and Hipponous was aware of this when he sent his daughter to Calydon (Apollod. 1. 75). The Thebais (fr. 6 K.) simply related that Oeneus sacked Olenus and took away Periboea as his γέρας. But in Diodorus (4. 35) Periboea alleges that she is with child by Ares; and her father sent her to Oeneus to be destroyed. Oeneus, who had recently lost his wife Althaea and his son Meleager, had not the heart to kill Periboea, but married her and so became the father of Tydeus. Yet another variant is indicated by the proverb Τυδεὺς ἐκ συφορβίου (Plut. prov. 1. 5 [Paroem. 1 322]), which is explained by the story that Hipponous handed over his daughter Periboea, together with her infant child Tydeus, to the custody of swineherds. It is hardly possible to pick out the version of Sophocles from this medley; but Welcker was perhaps right (p. 428) in conjecturing that Oeneus himself was the father of the child, and that a recognition occurred in the course of the play.

There is an important reference to the play in Pollux 4. III τραγικὸν δ' οὐκ ἔστιν (sc. ἡ παράβασις)· ἀλλ' Εὐριπίδης αὐτὸ πεποίηκεν ἐν πολλοῖς δράμασιν. ἐν μὲν γε τῇ Δανάῃ τὸν χορὸν τὰς γυναῖκας ὑπὲρ αὐτοῦ τι ποιήσας παράδειν, ἐκλαθόμενος ὡς ἄνδρας λέγειν ἐποίησε τῷ σχήματι τῆς λέξεως τὰς γυναῖκας. καὶ Σοφοκλῆς δ' αὐτὸ ἐκ τῆς πρὸς ἐκείνον ἀμίλλης ποιεῖ σπανιάκεις, ὥσπερ ἐν Ἰππώνῳ. Nauck and others have drawn from this passage the inference that the chorus in the Hipponous consisted of women, who in a particular passage spoke of themselves in the masculine gender. But an examination of the context makes it clear that αὐτὸ ποιεῖ refers back to the opening of the section, defining παράβασις as the occasion when the chorus expressed the real opinions of the poet.

Pacuvius wrote a play entitled Periboea, but there is no particular indication that he followed Sophocles.

¹ See n. on fr. 300, from which I infer that Calydon was the scene of the play.

300

ἐξ Ὀλένου γῆς φορβάδος κομίζομαι.

300 Steph. Byz. p. 707, 14 Ὀλένος πόλις Ἀχαΐας καὶ Αἰτωλίας θηλυκῶς λεγομένη... Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰππῶνι (so Meursius for ἰπῶνι or ἰπῶνι or ἰπῶνι of the codd.) 'ἐξ... κομίζομαι.'

I suppose these to have been the words of Periboea on her arrival at Calydon from her native Olenus. The Aetolian Olenus is mentioned by Homer (B 639) together with other Aetolian towns. It was under Mt Aracynthus in the neighbourhood of Pleuron, and was destroyed by the Aeolians (Strabo 451, 460). On the other hand Homer did not mention the Achaeae Olenus (Strabo 386). It might be thought that Sophocles would follow the Homeric geography, and in the Thebais (fr. 6 Kinkel), where Oeneus won Periboea as a prize at the sack of Olenus, the Aetolian town was probably intended. But the considerations in favour of Achaea are much stronger. Not only did Hesiod (fr. 97 Rz.) mention Hipponous the father of Periboea as sending her to Oeneus from his home at Olenus in Achaea, but Diodorus (4. 35), who tells the story in a form which may well have been that of Sophocles, also implies that Olenus was in Achaea. It should be added that the Achaeae Olenus was also the scene of an adventure of Heracles, in which he avenged an insult offered to the daughter of Dexamenus by the centaur Eurytion (Pausan. 5. 3. 3, 7. 18. 1, Apollod. 2. 5. 5). Bacchylides, however, placed the incident in Elis (fr. 48 J.), from which the existence of a third Olenus has been inferred.—γῆς φορβάδος is 'the land that nourished me' like τῇ τε βοσκούσῃ χθονὶ | καὶ τῇ τρεφούσῃ Eur. Helid. 826. In Phil. 700 γαίης φορβάδος is rather 'the bounteous earth.'

301

πρὸς ταῦτα κρύπτε μῆδέν, ὥς ὁ πάνθ' ὄρων
καὶ πάντ' ἀκούων πάντ' ἀναπτύσσει χρόνος.

301. 1 ὁ πάνθ' Clem., Stobaei F: ἅπανθ' Gellius, Stobaei P cod. L Clementis

2 χρόνος

301 Clem. Alex. strom. 6 p. 742 Σοφοκλέους δὲ ἐξ Ἰππῶνι 'πρὸς... χρόνος.' The lines are also quoted by Stob. cel. 1. 8. 17, p. 96, 8 W., with the lemma σοφοκλ' placed in F in the margin opposite to the second v. of the quotation, and in P opposite to the first v. of the next quotation. Wachsmuth, no doubt rightly, inferred that the lemma belonged to this extract; and it follows that the lines formerly attributed to Sophocles as fr. 833 N¹. [= 658 D.] are shown to be of uncertain authorship (Tr. fr. adesp. 509 N²). Gellius Noct. Att. 12. 11. 6 propterea versus istos Sophocli, prudentissimi poetarum, in ore esse habendos dicebat: πρὸς... χρόνος.

πρὸς ταῦτα is regularly combined with the imperative or its equivalent: see Jebb on Ai. 971, Neil on Ar. Eq. 622, Eur. Helid. 978 n.—ὁ πάνθ' ὄρων... χρόνος: cf. O. T. 1213 ἐφευρέ σ' ἀκονθ' ὁ πάνθ' ὄρων χρόνος, O. C. 1454 ὄρα ὄρα πάντ' αἰὲν χρόνος. Tr. fr. adesp. 510 ὄρα βλέπει γὰρ ὁ χρόνος, δς τὰ πάνθ' ὄρα. Time is the discoverer or revealer who brings the truth to light: fr. 918, Pind. Ol. 10. 53 δ τ' ἐξελέγχων μόνος | ἀλήθειαν ἐτήτυμον | Χρόνος, Eur. Hipp. 1051 οὐδὲ μνηστὴν χρόνον δέξῃ καθ' ἡμῶν; fr. 441 χρόνος διέρπων πάντ' ἀληθεύειν φιλεῖ.—Wecklein would read πᾶν ἀναπτύσσει, which is attractive but hardly necessary. Cf. El. 639.

302

σωτηρίας γὰρ φάρμακ' οὐχὶ πανταχοῦ βλέψαι πάρεστιν, ἐν δὲ τῇ προμηθίᾳ...

302 Orion flor. 4. 2, p. 46, 10 ἐκ τοῦ Ἰππώνου Σοφοκλέους. 'σωτηρίας...τῇ προμηθείᾳ.'

It seems probable (though the assumption is not necessary) that the sentence is incomplete, and that something like κέρδος μέγιστον followed the words quoted. There is moreover clearly some dislocation in the text of Orion, as Schneidewin pointed out. For the profit to be earned from foresight is often mentioned: fr. 950. 3, Eur. Andr. 690 ἐμοὶ δὲ κέρδος ἡ προμηθία, Suppl. 510 καὶ τοῦτό τοι τάνδρεϊον, ἡ προμηθία ('discretion is the better part of valour'). 'A saving remedy is not to be had for the asking': for the genitive of description σωτηρίας φάρμακα cf. Eur. Hel. 1055 σωτηρίας δὲ τοῦτ' ἔχει τί νῦν ἄκος; Phoen. 893 φάρμακον σωτηρίας. Cobet (V. L. p. 60), commenting on φλναρίας φάρμακον in Alciphron, remarks: 'usitatus φάρμακον dicitur id quo quid efficitur quam contra.'—βλέψαι, to catch sight of, is suspected by Blaydes, who requires εὔρεῖν or ὁρᾶν. See also on fr. 583, 2.

303

ἀπαλέξασθαι

303 Hesych. 1 p. 225 ἀπαλέξασθαι· ἀποφυλάσσειν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰππώνω. The same form occurs in Ai. 165 χήμεις οὐδὲν σθένεον πρὸς ταῦτ' | ἀπαλέξασθαι σοῦ χωρὶς, ἀναξ. Similar forms, requiring a present ἀλέκω rather than ἀλέξω, appear in Hom. Hdt. Hippocr. Xen., as well as in Aesch. Suppl. 1063 ὁ μέγας Ζεὺς ἀπαλέξει κτέ. See also Jebb on O. T. 539.

304

ἀπαρθένευτος

304 Hesych. 1 p. 227 ἀπαρθένευτος· ἀκέραιος, καθάρᾳ. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰππώνω. Cf. Bekk. anecd. p. 418, 11 ἀπαρθένευτος· ἀκέραιος, καθάρᾳ (καθάρᾳ conj. Blaydes).

ἀπαρθένευτος in Eur. I. A. 993, Phoen. 1739, means unmarried, but in carm. 8 (PLG III 657) σοὶ, Βάκχε, τάνδε μούσαν ἀγλαίζομεν | ...καὶ νῦν, ἀπαρθένευ-

τον, οὔτι ταῖς πάρος | κεχρημέναν ὥδαῖσιν, ἀλλ' ἀκήρατον | καταρχόμεν τὸν ὕμνον Smyth is undoubtedly right in rendering 'virgin.' Wecklein refers to the use of κορεύειν (usually διακορεύειν) for devirginare, but nothing similar is recorded of παρθενεύω.

ΙΦΙΓΕΝΕΙΑ

The character of the plot is indicated by two of the fragments. The authorities who quote fr. 305 refer to the betrothal of Iphigenia to Achilles, making it plain that the progress of the action was similar to that of the Iphigenia at Aulis of Euripides. It is also known that Clytaemnestra accompanied her daughter to Aulis, and that Odysseus was one of those who were privy to the plot. The latter circumstance probably shows, as we shall see, that Sophocles followed the version of the Cypria more closely than Euripides. Welcker (p. 107 ff.) suggests that the relations between Odysseus and Achilles were of the same kind as the dealings of the former with Neoptolemus in the Philoctetes. This evidence is confirmed by fr. 308, which may reasonably be referred to the delay of the expedition at Aulis.

The version of the Cypria, according to the epitome of Proclus (EGF p. 19), was as follows: καὶ τὸ δεύτερον ἡθροισμένον τοῦ στόλου ἐν Αὐλίδι Ἀγαμέμνων ἐπὶ θήρας βαλὼν ἔλαφον ὑπερβάλλειν ἔφησε καὶ τὴν Ἀρτεμιν¹. μνήσασα δὲ ἡ θεὸς ἐπέσχευ αὐτοὺς τοῦ πλοῦ χειμῶνας ἐπιπέμπουσα. Κάλχαντος δὲ εἰπόντος τὴν τῆς θεοῦ μὴνιν καὶ Ἰφιγένειαν κελεύσαντος θύειν τῇ Ἀρτέμιδι, ὥς ἐπὶ γάμον αὐτὴν Ἀχιλλεὺ μεταπεμφάμενοι θύειν ἐπιχειροῦσιν. Ἀρτεμις δὲ αὐτὴν ἐξαρπάσασα εἰς Ταύρους μετακομίζει καὶ ἀθάνατον ποιεῖ, ἔλαφον δὲ ἀντὶ τῆς κόρης παρίστησι τῷ Βωμῷ. Apollod. epit. 3. 21, 22 reproduces this with hardly any addition, except the statement that Odysseus and Talthybius were sent to negotiate with Clytaemnestra, with the plea that Iphigenia should be given in marriage to Achilles as the price for obtaining his participation in the war. Hygin. fab. 98, which Nauck and others suggest to have been derived from Sophocles, is exactly similar, except that Diomedes takes the place of Talthybius. We shall hardly go wrong in inferring that these extracts give us a rough outline of the Sophoclean play.

Of the Iphigenia of Aeschylus (TGF p. 31) hardly anything is known. Ennius, in his play bearing this title, is believed to have followed Euripides (Ribbeck, p. 94 f.); but from a considerable fragment quoted by Gellius (N.A. 19. 10. 12) it appears that the chorus consisted of Argive warriors. Hence Bergk, followed by Welcker, conjectured that this feature was borrowed by Ennius from Sophocles. It should be added that the substance of the fragment (fr. III otio qui nescit uti plus negoti habet | quam si cuist negotiosus animus in negotio) resembles the thought of fr. 308; but the coincidence hardly establishes Bergk's inference.

Welcker conjectured that the title Clytaemnestra, known to us from a single quotation (fr. 334), was a careless allusion to the present play. That is possible; but it is perhaps more natural to refer the notice to the Aegisthus, if such a play existed (p. 21). The Agamemnon of Aeschylus seems to have been regarded as an unapproachable model, and, if Sophocles treated the subject at all, he probably reverted to the Homeric standpoint.

¹ Observe the close resemblance to El. 569 (Jebb's n.).

305

σὺ δ' ὦ μεγίστων τυγχάνουσα πενθερῶν

305 Phot. lex. p. 410, 13 (Suid. s.v.) πενθερά· τῷ νυμφίῳ ἢ τῆς κόρης μήτηρ. καὶ πενθερός, ὁ πατήρ. Εὐριπίδης δὲ γαμβρὸν αὐτὸν παρὰ τάξιν λέγει [quoting Eur. frs. 72, 647]...Σοφοκλῆς δὲ τὸ ἐμπαλιν· εἶπε γὰρ πενθερὸν τὸν γαμβρὸν ἐν Ἰφιγενείᾳ. Ὁδυσσεὺς φησὶ πρὸς Κλυταιμῆστραν περὶ Ἀχιλλέως. 'σὺ δ'...πενθερῶν.' ἀντὶ τοῦ γαμβρῶν. Cf. Bekk. anecd. p. 229, 1 and Etym. M. p. 220, 40 Σοφοκλῆς δὲ τὸν πενθερὸν ἀντὶ τοῦ γαμβροῦ τέθεικεν (λέγει Etym. M.).

Both πενθερός and γαμβρός are used loosely for marriage-connexions. In Eur. El. 1286 τὸν λόγῳ σὺν πενθερῶν, addressed to Orestes concerning the αὐτοκτονίαν, π. = brother-in-law. So γαμβρός must be rendered father-in-law in Eur. Andr. 641 and γαμβροὶ 'parents-in-law' in Hipp. 635.—Notice that πενθερῶν is an allusive plural, if we can trust the statement that it refers to Achilles: so O. T. 1176 κτενεῖν νιν τοὺς τεκόντας (i.e. his father) ἦν λόγος. See Kuehner-Gerth 1 18.—For the importance of this passage in relation to the plot see Introductory Note.

306

ὀξήρὸν ἄγγος οὐ μελισσοῦσθαι πρέπει.

306 μελιττοῦσθαι codd.

306 Proverb. append. 4. 27 (Parasem. 1 440) ὀξήρὸν...πρέπει. ἐπὶ τοῦ ἀναξίου. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰφιγενείᾳ.

The significance of the proverb is similar to Matth. evang. 9. 17 οὐδὲ βάλλουσιν οἶνον νέον εἰς ἀσκοῦς παλαιούς; the vinegar-pot is not fit afterwards to contain honey. In the same manner is fr. 611.

ὀξήρὸν ἄγγος: so ὀξήρὸν κεράμιον in Ar. fr. 723 (1 566 K.), κύνωψ ὀξήρῳ τερπόμενος κεράμῳ A. P. 12. 108. There is a similar reference to a homely proverb in Aesch. Ag. 334 f. ὄξος τ' ἀλειφά τ' ἐγχείας ταύτῃ κῦναι | διχοστατοῦντ' ἂν οὐ φίλῳ προσενέποις.—μελισσοῦσθαι is written μελιττοῦσθαι in the text of the source. The form has been suspected, since μελιττοῦσθαι appears elsewhere with this meaning: Plut. qu. conv. 1. 10. 2, p. 628 D, Democritus enquired the reason why a cucumber tasted sweet, and the waiting-woman replied, ἐγὼ γὰρ ἀγνοήσασα τὸ σίκνον εἰς ἄγγειον ἐθέμην μεμελιτωμένον. Hence Nauck (Index p. xii) proposed οὐχὶ μελιτοῦσθαι. But, as Sophocles uses μέλισσα in the sense of μέλι (O. C. 481), there is no reason why he should not have adopted μελισσοῦσθαι for μελιττοῦσθαι. The formation is as legitimate in one case as in the other (cf. γεφυροῦσθαι); and the -ow suffix became enormously productive with causative function (Brugmann, Comp. Gr. 1^v p. 297 E. tr.).

307

νόει πρὸς ἀνδρὶ χρώμα πουλύπους ὅπως πέτρα τραπέσθαι γνησίου φρονήματος.

307. 1 νόει codd.: νοῦν δέi Porson | παρ' ἀνδρὶ Reiske, πρὸς ἀνδρα Gomperz | χρώμα Reiske: σῶμα codd. 2 πέτραν Gomperz | γνησίον ἐκ φρονήματος C. Keil

307 Athen. 513 D ὁμοίως φησὶ καὶ Σοφοκλῆς ἐν Ἰφιγενείᾳ 'νόει...φρονήματος.'

The trick of the polypus in concealing itself from its foes or in lying in wait for its prey is often mentioned: Aelian v. h. 1 1 ἑλλοχωῖσι δὲ οἱ πολυπόδες καὶ τοὺς ἰχθύς τὸν τρόπον τούτων. ὑπὸ ταῖς πέτραις κἀθηρται, καὶ ἐαυτοὺς ἐς τὴν ἐκείνων μεταμορφοῦσι χροῖαν, καὶ τοῦτο εἶναι δοκοῦσιν

ἔπερ οὖν καὶ πεφύκασιν αἱ πέτραι. Arist. h. a. 9. 37. 622⁸ 8, adding τὸ δ' αὐτὸ τοῦτο ποιεῖ καὶ φοβηθεῖς, Plin. n. h. 9. 29. 87 colore et multat ad similitudinem loci et maxime in metu, [Arist.] mir. auscult. 29, Lucian dial. mar. 4. 3 ὅποια ἂν πέτρα προσελθὼν ἀρμόσῃ τὰς κοτύλας... ἐκείνη ὁμοίον ἀπεργάζεται ἐαυτὸν, καὶ μεταβάλλει τὴν χροῶν, μιμούμενος τὴν πέτραν, ὡς ἂν λάθῃ τοὺς ἀλίεας κτέ., A. P. 9. 10. 3 οὐπω δ' ἦν πέτρῃ ἱκελὸς χροῶ (sc. πούλυπος). In this connexion there is a constant appearance of the words μεταβολαί, τροπαί, and the corresponding verbs: Plut. aet. phys. 19 p. 916 B, C, de sollert. anim. 27 p. 978 E, quomodo adul. ab am. intern. 8 p. 52 F, de am. mult. 9 p. 96 F. Hence the transformations of the polypus passed into a proverb (Diogen. 1. 23 πολυπόδος πολυχρόου νόον ἔσχε, Zenob. 1. 24 [Paroem. 1 pp. 8, 184]), and were applied to the wily man's adaptability to his surroundings (τὸ πολύτροπον), either with commendation as here and in Theogn. 215 f. πολύπου ὄργην ἔσχε πολυπλόκου, δὲ ποτὶ πέτρῃ, | τῇ προσομιλήσῃ, τοῖς ἰδεῖν ἐφάνη, Pind. fr. 43 ὦ τέκνον, | ποντίου θηρὸς πετραίου | χρωτὶ μάλιστα νόον | προσφέρων πάσαις πολέουσιν ὀμίλει· | τῷ παρεόντι δ' ἐπαυρήσας ἐκὼν | ἄλλοι' ἄλλοι' ἀφρονεῖ. Anon. ap. Clearch. (FHG II 318) in Athen. 317 A (cf. Antig. hist. mir. 29) πολυπόδος μοι, τέκνον, ἔχων νόον, 'Ἀμφίλοχ' ἦρως, | τοῖσιν ἐφαρμόζον τῶν κεν <κατὰ> δῆμον ἱκαί, —or the reverse, as in Ion fr. 36 καὶ τὸν πετραῖον πλεκτάνας ἀναίμωσιν | στυγῶ μεταλλακτῆρα πολυπόουν χροῶς, and in Plutarch. These passages offer abundant evidence in support of Reiske's χροῶμα, if they do not also, as J. thinks, completely justify πρὸς ἀνδρῖ. Further, I infer that τραπέσθαι means 'to change,' being followed by φρονήματος as an abl. gen. of separation: see Theogn. 218 κρέσσαν τοι σοφίη γίνεται ἀτροπίης. J. however renders: 'Be mindful to adapt the hue of your real thought to your man, as the polypus adapts it to the rock'—but surely his real thought is what the πολύτροπος desires to conceal from his fellow men.—πρὸς ἀνδρῖ means 'as you approach another,' 'when close to him'; for which cf. πρὸς τοῖς πολέμοις εἶναι Thuc. 3. 22, 77, and πρὸς αὐτῷ γ' εἶμι τῷ δεινῷ λέγειν O. T. 1169, J., whose view is somewhat different, compares A. 95 ἐβλάψας ἔγχος εἰς πρὸς Ἀργεῶν στρατῷ.—πολύπους: for the Ionism see Smyth, Ionian Dialect, § 254, and Jebb on Ant. 86.—πέρῃ might be a locative dative (Phil. 144), but it is more likely that we should carry on the influence of πρὸς from the main clause. Cobet, Var. Lect. p. 163 ff., laid down the important distinction that, when the clause of comparison precedes, no preposition accompanies the noun of the main sentence (e.g. Plat. rep. 414 E δὲ ὡς περὶ μητρὸς καὶ τροφῆς τῆς χῶρας ἀμύνειν); but that, when the comparison follows, the preposition must appear in the second clause. He consequently emended the fragment of Antiphanes: πρὸς γὰρ τὸ γῆρας ὥσπερ ἐργαστήριον | ἅπαντα τὰνθρώπεια προσφοιτᾷ κακὰ by writing ὡς πρὸς ἐργαστήριον. No doubt the distinction is generally observed, but Kock (II 116) and Gomperz (Nachl. p. 7) seem right in denying its universality.—There is no need for violent alterations like Blaydes's σοφοῦ πρὸς ἀνδρῖ, or Pflugk's δευροῦ πρὸς ἀνδρῖ γνῶμα πολυπόου τρύτοις | παρεκτραπέσθαι γνησίου φρονήματος. Porson's νοῦν δὲι makes the structure more symmetrical by providing an accusative to balance χροῶμα, but introduces the fresh awkwardness of leaving χροῶμα to represent both νοῦν and φρονήματος, which are apparently distinguished. Since τρέπεσθαι is used in the required sense as well absolutely as with a limiting accusative, it may be doubted whether any change is necessary. Bergk's σχῆμα (for σώμα) would avoid this particular difficulty.—J. thinks that the words were spoken by Odysseus, who was the agent of Agamemnon's fraud. Bergk, who understood ἀνδρῖ as 'husband,' thought that Clytaemnestra was addressing her daughter.

308

τίκτει γὰρ οὐδὲν ἐσθλὸν εἰκαῖα σχολή.

308 εἰκαῖα σχολή S: εἰ καὶ ἀσκολῇ (ἀσכולῇ A) MA

308 Stob. flor. 30. 6 (III p. 664, 12 Hense) Σοφοκλέους Ἰφιγενείας. 'τίκτει... σχολή.' θεὸς δὲ τοῖς ἀργούσιν οὐ παρίσταται (Tr. fr. adesp. 527).

I do not hesitate (with Nauck) to refer this line to the period of delay at Aulis, when the Greek fleet was kept back by contrary winds or a calm (Jebb on EL).

564). See also on fr. 479, 4, τερπνὸν ἀργίας ἄκος. F. W. Schmidt had no justification for proposing τίκτειν...εἰκαία φιλεῖ | σπουδῇ, which recalls Seyffert's σπουδῇ βραδύς in Ant. 231. Nauck fell foul of εἰκαία, and conjectured ἡ λαν σχολή (misprinted σφολή). But εἰκαία σχολή seems an entirely suitable phrase to distinguish an aimless inactivity (cf. Aesch. Ag. 203 πρὸς κακὸςχολοί, with the schol. ἐπὶ κακῷ ποιοῦσαι σχολάζειν) from that σχολή which is the indispensable condition of free freedom: see Eur. Ion 633 f., Arist. pol. 4 (7). 15. 1334^a 20 κατὰ γὰρ τὴν παρρημίαν, οὐ σχολή δούλοισι. The rarity of εἰκαίος is probably accidental. Cf. Ar.

Nub. 44 βίος...εἰκὴ κείμενος. Hense however thinks that εἰκαία is probably due to some philosopher (as Chrysippus) who only approved leisure as the result of deliberate choice. He quotes Sen. de otio 3, 3. 8, 1.

The line which follows in Stobaeus as if it belonged to the same extract was first separated from it by Wagner. It is found, with the reading ἀργοῖσιν, in Menand. monost. 242. For the sentiment see on fr. 407. An error of a precisely similar kind was made by Apostolius in quoting Al. 1252 (see Jebb's ed. p. 237).

309

ἀκρονυχῇ

309 Hesych. 1 p. 107 ἀκρονυχῇ· ἄκρον ἔχει. "Ἄκρον δὲ ὅρος (ὄρους cod.) τῆς Ἀργείας, ἐφ' ᾗ Ἀρτέμιδος ἱερὸν ἰδρύσατο Μελάμπου καθάρας τὰς Προϊτίδας, ἡγουν ταῖς Χάρισι." Σοφοκλῆς 'Φιγενεία.

From this obscure but interesting passage we are justified in inferring that Sophocles used the word ἀκρονυχῇ for dwells on the heights, and probably that Artemis was the subject to the verb. Her connexion with the plot needs no remark, and there is sufficient evidence to prove that her cult was often established on the summit of a mountain. Hence Eur. I. T. 126 ὦ παῖ τὰς Ἀατοῖς | Δίκτυν' οὐρεῖα, and the similar epithets ὄρειάτης, ὄρειόφορος, ὄρειάτης, ὄρειάς (Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 12843). In Argos she was worshipped under the title of Ἀκρία: Hesych. 1 p. 104 Ἀκρία...ἔστι δὲ καὶ ἡ Ἥρα καὶ Ἀρτέμις καὶ Ἀφροδίτη προσαγορευομένη ἐν Ἀργεῖ, κατὰ τὸ ὅμοιον ἐπ' ἄκρῳ ἰδρυμένη. At Epidaurus she bore the title Κορυφαία from her sanctuary on the top of Mt Coryphum (Pausan. 2. 28. 2). On the top of Mt Lycone close to the border of Argos and Arcadia was a temple of Artemis Orthia (Pausan. 2. 24. 5). On Mt Crathis in Arcadia was a sanctuary of the Pyrronian Artemis, where a fire of peculiar sanctity was kept burning (Pausan. 8. 15. 9). She also had a sanctuary on Mt Artemisius above Oenoe (Pausan. 2. 25. 3). The rest of the gloss in Hesych. is a learned aetiological note intended to explain the origin of the word ἀκρονυχῇ as applied to Artemis. It is unnecessary to suppose that there was any allusion to the daughters of Proetus in the text of Sophocles. The story of their madness and its healing is most fully given in Apollod. 2. 24—29. In the account of Bacchylides (10. 40—112) there is no reference to Melampus. Hesych. is the only authority who mentions the mountain Acrum in connexion with this story; the scene of their healing is given either as Sicyon (Apollod., Pausan. 2. 7. 8), the river Anigrus in Elis (Pausan. 5. 5. 10, Strabo 346), or Lusi in Arcadia (Bacchyl., Pausan. 8. 18. 8 etc.). The last-mentioned alternative induced Jacobs (on A. P. [append. 420] xi p. 406) to make the violent and impossible conjecture ἐν Λουσίοις ἐν Ἀρκάδι in place of the words ἡγουν ταῖς Χάρισι. Unger's ἡγουν ταῖς χορείαις (Theb. Parad. p. 459) rests on Apollod. 2. 29, where Melampus is said to have cured the Proetides by the employment of magic dancing (μετ' ἀλαλαγμοῦ καὶ τινοῦ ἐνθέου χορείας). But the text of Hesych. has been so mutilated that the words may very well be sound, recording an alternative or joint cult of the Charites established by Melampus at the time of the healing. For the common worship of Artemis and the Charites see Wernicke in Pauly-Wissowa II 1363. Wagner wished to substitute ἀκρονυχῇ· ἄκρον ἔχουσα, and M. Schmidt, who observed that the alphabetical order is slightly disturbed at this point, strangely suggested Ἀκρ' ὄχει.

310

Βασίλη

310 Hesych. I p. 362 βασίλη· βασίλεια (βασιλ, ἢ βασίλεια cod.). Σοφοκλῆς Ἰφιγενεία.

In Pind. Nem. 1. 39 ἀλλὰ θεῶν βασιλεῖς
(so Schroeder: βασίλεια codd.) the word is trisyllabic, however written. The form Βασίλη is also attested by Steph. Byz.
p. 13, 1 Ἀγάμεια· λέγεται δὲ καὶ Ἀγάμνη, ὡς πρέσβεια πρέσβη, καὶ τὸ βασίλεια κατὰ συναλωφὴν Βασίλη. Smyth, Ionis Dia- lect. § 177, refers to Herodian I 275, 3

Lentz. Cf. Iérea on Attic inscriptions (Meisterhans², p. 40). It is worth mentioning that βασίλεια was a title of Artemis in Thrace (Hdt. 4. 32); but of course there is nothing to show that Sophocles used Βασίλη as a divine title. For the form see also Usener, Götternamen,
p. 222₁₂.

311

πύνδαξ

311 Hesych. I p. 267 ἀπυνδακῶτος· ἀπύθμενος. Σοφοκλῆς Τριπολέμῳ (fr. 554).
ἐν δὲ Ἰφιγενείᾳ πύνδακα (πυνδάκα cod.)
τοῦ ξίφους τὴν λαβὴν ἔφη. Eustath. II.
p. 870, 28 Σοφοκλῆς δὲ καὶ τὴν λαβὴν τοῦ ξίφους πύνδακα εἰρηκεν, ὡς φησὶ Πανσανίας (fr. 289 Schw.).

Similarly πυθμὴν may be used for the stem or trunk of a tree, considered apart from the foliage: so Aesch. Suppl. 111
οἶα νεάζει πυθμὴν | δι' ἁμὸν γάμον τεθα-
λῶς | δυσπαραβούλοισι φρεσίν, Cho. 203
σμικροῦ γένουσι' ἂν σπέρματος μέγας πυθμὴν.

312 ὑπάφρον

312 Erotian. gloss. Hippocr. p. 129, 1 attests that this word was used by Sophocles in the Iphigenia. See on fr. 236, where the source is quoted.

313

[ὁ Ἀπόλλων παρὰ τοῦ Διὸς λαμβάνει τοὺς χρησμούς.]

313 Schol. Soph. O. C. 793 δοκεῖ γὰρ ὁ Ἀπόλλων παρὰ τοῦ Διὸς λαμβάνειν τοὺς χρησμούς, ὡς καὶ ἐν Ἰφικλείᾳ (Ἰφιγε-νεία conj. Schneider).

Schneider's conjecture, ἸφίΓΕΝεία for Ἰφικλεία, is probably right, as Ἰφικλεία (Boeckh, Welcker, and Hippenstiel) is an unlikely title: see Introductory Note to the Oedus. Dindorf suggests Οἰκλεία as a possible alternative; but this is less likely to have been corrupted to Ἰφικλεία.

Apollo, as a μάντις, is the mouthpiece of Zeus: Hom. h. Ap. 131 χρῆσω δ' ἀν-θρώποισι Διὸς νημερτέα βουλὴν, Aesch.

Eum. 19 Διὸς προφήτης δ' ἐστὶ Λαξίας
πατρός, fr. 86 ταῦτα γὰρ πατήρ | Ζεὺς ἐγκαθίει Λαξία θεσπίσματα, Soph. O. C.
623 εἰ Ζεὺς ἐτι Ζεὺς χῶ Διὸς Φοῖβος σαφής.
Hence in O. T. 151 the oracle which has just been announced from Delphi is addressed as ὦ Διὸς ἀδυσπεὶς φάτι· cf. ibid.
498. In Pind. Ol. 8. 43 Apollo interprets a portent: ὡς ἐμοὶ φάσμα λέγει
Ἴκρονίδα | πεμφθέν βαρυγούπου Διός.

ΙΧΝΕΥΤΑΙ ΣΑΤΥΡΟΙ

The three fragments which before 1911 were alone associated with this title were not of such a character as to reveal the subject-matter; and the guess of Welcker that the Trackers were engaged upon the search for Europa, when she was carried off by Zeus, and that of Ahrens that they were the prophets invited by Minos to search for Glaucus remained equally unverifiable. The obscurity has now been dispelled by the discovery, among the documents which have been recovered from the dust-heaps of Oxyrhynchus, of a large portion of a papyrus roll which contained the Ichneutae. The constituent fragments of the roll were successfully fitted together by Prof. A. S. Hunt, and in the result he was able to publish in vol. IX of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri (no. 1174 at p. 30 ff.) the more or less complete remains of fifteen successive columns starting from the opening of the play and containing about 400 lines, some two-thirds of which are substantially intact. A number of smaller fragments which could not be located¹ adds little or nothing to the sum of our knowledge.

The MS, which is carefully written, is assigned to the closing decades of the second century A.D. A number of corrections, including marks of punctuation, has been added by a second hand, and various readings recorded in the margin proceed from the same source. These variants are sometimes quoted from specified authorities—particularly from the edition of Theon²; besides him, Aristophanes³ and possibly Nicander⁴ (or Nicanor) are cited. Another notable feature is the appearance of stichometric figures, giving the numeration of each hundredth line, which however do not agree exactly with the requirements of the text. From these circumstances it may be inferred that we have a critically revised text descended from a grammarian's copy. The MS is a less elaborate example of the type which is characteristically represented by the papyrus containing the Paeans of Pindar (Ox. Pap. v, no. 841).

¹ These are not included in the present edition, with the exception of fr. 317.

² Possibly the well-known grammarian, who lived in the age of Augustus and worked on the text of the Alexandrian poets. See Susemihl, Al. Lit. II 215 ff. Theon is also mentioned in a scholium on Pind. Paeon. 2. 37. Wilamowitz (Neue Jahrb. XXIX 450) declines to speculate on the identity of this Theon.

³ There is a possibility that some of the abbreviated references may be intended for Aristonicus or Aristarchus; see Hunt on III 20.

⁴ By the abbreviation Νι in v. 102: the same authority is quoted on fr. 84 (Ox. Pap. IX p. 113) of the Eurypylus.

The subject of the play proves to be identical with that of the Homeric hymn to Hermes, although the development of the story proceeds upon somewhat different lines. The play opens with the appearance of Apollo, who relates the loss of his cattle and describes his hitherto unsuccessful attempts to discover the thief during his progress from Northern Greece to Mt Cyllene in Arcadia. He accordingly issues a proclamation to all whom it may concern, promising a definite reward to anyone who shall enable him to recover his property. Silenus enters in answer to the summons, and offers the assistance of his sons the satyrs, but stipulates that a reward of gold shall be paid over, and that he and his sons shall be released from slavery. Apollo leaves the stage, as the chorus of satyrs advances. They are ready at once to start in pursuit, and Silenus in a short speech invokes divine and human aid. Then the chorus, bending on all-fours and imitating the actions of keen-scented hounds, discover the confused tracks of cattle pointing in different directions. But, before the quarry can be run to earth, the pursuers are alarmed by a strange sound entirely unlike to any which they have hitherto known¹. It seems to issue from the cave towards which the chase has brought them. Silenus upbraids them for their cowardice, and contrasts their degenerate attitude with his own distinguished bravery in the days of old. The hunt is then renewed, and Silenus undertakes to support and protect his children by accompanying them to the point of danger. The strange noise is again heard, and for a second time the ardour of the pursuit is damped. But the actual issue of the combined undertaking is not altogether clear. I have suggested that Silenus, just now so valiant, proves himself rather more of a coward than his followers, and by refusing to continue the adventure and abruptly leaving the stage, abandons the chorus to its fate. However this may be, it seems certain that subsequently the coryphaeus assumed the position previously occupied by Silenus as representative spokesman for his comrades; but it is probable that Silenus afterwards reappeared, or, if he was present throughout, resumed the prominence which he had temporarily abandoned.

After noisy but ineffectual efforts by the chorus to accomplish their task, the situation is suddenly changed by the arrival of Cyllene, the mountain-nymph, who comes forth from her cave². Addressing the satyrs as 'beasts' (θηρες), she angrily enquires what is the purpose of their new labours, and why the silence of the glens has been disturbed by their shouts, and the hue and cry raised for the arrest of a thief. The chorus replies in humble tones, and asks for an explanation of the marvellous sound which comes echoing from the upland hollows. Cyllene, somewhat mollified, would have preferred to know their business first; but finally, after warning them of the serious consequences which would follow a disclosure of the secret to others, she consents to explain what has astonished them. Zeus, it appears, having secretly visited the daughter of Atlas without the knowledge of Hera, had begotten a son by her. During the mother's illness, Cyllene has been nursing the newly-born infant. But he proved to be no ordinary child; for, though born less than a week ago, his growth has been so rapid that he has already passed from childhood to maturity. As his father's command required that he should be kept concealed within the cave, he had occupied his time with the construction from a dead beast of a mysterious toy, which produces the strange melodies now in question. In answer to further requests for an explanation of the riddle, Cyllene describes the making of the lyre from the shell of the tortoise. There are some serious gaps in the papyrus at this point, but, since the chorus immediately proceeds to denounce the divine child as the thief of whom they are in search, it is clear that Cyllene must have referred to the ox-hide which had been stretched over the shell. She waxes indignant at their audacity: to charge the son of such parents with larceny is a monstrous piece of insolence, which betrays the childish ineptitude of the accusers. Let them beware lest their foolish gibes are not exchanged for cries of pain. Nevertheless, the satyrs persist, and apparently challenge Cyllene to produce the cows, so that their identity may be established.

¹ I have assumed that βοῖβδος (n. on 107) is identical with ψόφος of 138. The alarm is not so great on the first occasion, because the sound is indistinctly heard.

² See Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 8273. Miss Harrison infers from 211 ff. that Cyllene occupied an underground cave-dwelling: Essays presented to W. Ridgway, p. 136 ff.

Here unfortunately the papyrus ends, and we can only guess at the sequel. It is certain that Apollo returned, and that in consequence of the recovery of the cattle he rewarded Silenus according to his promise. The reconciliation with Hermes must have followed, and no doubt the gift of the lyre placated Apollo for the outrage which had been committed against his property.

Such is the story of the play so far as we are permitted to trace it, and it is apparent that it differs in several respects from the Homeric version. (1) The theft of the cows here precedes, but in Homer follows the invention of the lyre. (2) The cows are concealed on Mt Cyllene itself and not in the neighbourhood of Triphylian Pylos. (3) Cyllene¹ and not Maia has charge of the infant. (4) The informer, to whom later writers gave the name of Battus, is displaced by the satyrs,—an essential modification in view of the dramatic requirements. We know little or nothing of the intermediate literature¹, and, so far as we can tell, the only innovation for which Sophocles was responsible may have been the introduction of the satyrs. The details of the cattle-stealing are less complex than in the hymn, and the choice of Mt Cyllene as the hiding-place of the herd is at least as likely to have been a reversion to the primitive legend as a necessary outcome of the dramatic situation². Apollodorus in the mythographical handbook (3. 112 ff.) follows generally the narrative of the hymn; but, though he differs widely from Sophocles, he nevertheless agrees with him in making the theft of the cattle prior to the invention of the lyre, and also in connecting the two incidents together as part of the same operation. According to Apollodorus, Hermes made strings for his lyre from the guts of the slain cattle; we cannot say whether this point was mentioned by Sophocles, but he certainly alluded to the skins of the cows having been used in the construction of some part of the instrument (307 n., 337, 366). The latter proceeding is a reminiscence of the hymn³; but the ox-hide there mentioned did not belong to Apollo's cattle, which Hermes had not yet stolen. Similarly, the hymn-writer, as contrasted with Apollodorus, mentions sheep-gut as the material out of which Hermes fashioned the strings. Although Apollodorus has much in common with the hymn, it is idle to suppose that he made it his sole source, and that his deviations from it were the fruit of his own invention⁴.

¹ For other traces of this tradition see n. on 266.

The most striking result of the comparison of Sophocles with the hymn is the combination by the former of two distinct achievements, so that the invention of the lyre not only provides the means of appeasing the indignation of Apollo, but also appears to have been directly prompted by the theft of the cows. The linking together of these separate threads was a dramatic advantage which Sophocles observed and appropriated, even if it originated, as may well have been the case, with one of

¹ A solitary fragment is preserved from the hymn of Alcaeus (fr. 5): χαίρε Κυλλάνας δ' μέδεις, σέ γάρ μοι | θύμος ὕμνην τὸν κορυφαῖον ἐν Ἀγναῖς | Μαῖα γέννατο Κρονίδα μεγαῖρα | παμβασίλῃ. Cf. Pausan. 7. 20. 4, Hor. Carm. 1. 10.

² Wilamowitz, p. 454. The same critic takes the view that the intimate connexion which had always subsisted in popular tradition between the cattle-stealing and the making of the lyre was deliberately sundered by the hymn-writer. But this is open to serious doubt, as will presently be shown.

³ vv. 47-49.

⁴ See Allen and Sikes, Homeric Hymns, p. 131, rejecting Gemoll's view. In fact, the sources of 'Apollodorus' are much more complex; from the discussion of E. Schwartz in Pauly-Wissowa 1 2875 ff. the following sentence is relevant: 'diese Litteratur ist eine compilatorische, die nur mit Überkommenem wirtschaftet und die Überlieferung nicht bereichert oder wissenschaftlich ordnet, sondern excerptiert und verdünnt.' See also Introduction, § 2.

his literary predecessors. It is more likely that this arrangement, which involved an alteration in the order of the events described in the hymn, was the deliberate invention of conscious art; than that popular tradition had always combined what the hymn-writer chose from a motive not easily discernible to separate¹. Both in method and in spirit the treatment of Sophocles is far removed from the work of the hymn-writer, but the extent of the debt which the tragedian must have acknowledged cannot be accurately measured owing to the loss of the second half of the play. It would have been particularly illuminating to discover what were the Attic traits added by Sophocles to the portrait of Hermes, whose precocious trickery is so cleverly delineated in the hymn. There are enough resemblances in detail to show that Sophocles was well acquainted with the Homeric text, as may be seen from the following instances: δοστροκον h. 33 and S. 305; h. 38 ἦν δὲ θάνης, τότε κεν μάλα καλὸν αἰδοῖς compared with S. 292 f.; φηλητής h. 67, 214, 446, and S. 332; μήνυτρον h. 264 and S. 81; βοῶν στίβος h. 353 and S. 109, 182; h. 8 f. and S. 264 (h. 6 ἄντρον ἔσω ναίονσα παλίσκιον answers to S. 265); τὰ χρήματα in h. 400 may have suggested S. 44 ὅπως τὸ χρήμα τοῦτό σοι κυνηγέσω; h. 407 f. θαυμαίνω and ἀέξεσθαι recall S. 271 f., although the application is different (the same considerations apply to ἀπονοσφίζεσθαι and δουεῖν in h. 562 f. as compared with S. 131 and 282); βήματα ἀντία h. 345 and S. 96, 112; the description of Cyllene in h. 228 answers to S. 215.

The other literary allusions to the story need not detain us long. Philostratus (imag. i. 25, entitled Ἑρμοῦ γοναί) makes Olympus the birthplace, and except in one small detail² is entirely remote from Sophocles. Antoninus Liberalis³ (23) relates the story of Battus for the purpose of recording the punishment inflicted upon him for his treachery; the theft of the cows was of secondary importance to him, and the only part of his narrative which concerns us is the itinerary of the cattle-drive, which may be used to illustrate the mutilated lines following v. 13. Ovid (Met. 2. 676-707) confines himself even more strictly to the subject of the transformation of Battus. The anonymous scholiast on Antoninus, who drew his information from the Λειμών of Pamphilus, prefaces this chapter with the citation of several authorities who had previously written on the subject. Nicander, Didymarchus, Antigonus, and Apollonius Rhodius belong to a later age; and it is improbable that Hesiod's Eoëae (fr. 153 Rz.) had any bearing upon the subsequent treatment of Sophocles. The gift of the κρηῖκεον by Apollo to Hermes is indicated in the hymn (529) and expressly recorded by later authorities¹. If the tradition was known to Sophocles, it seems unlikely that he would pass it over in silence.

¹ The hymn to Hermes is considered to be the latest in date of the longer hymns, but must be at least as early as the sixth century B.C. Robert (Herm. xli 389 ff.) argues that the entire incident of the invention of the lyre was a subsequent interpolation in the original form of the hymn, and that signs of the inconsistency thereby produced are still visible. See also Herwerden, Mnem. xxxv 181 ff., Kuiper, ib. xxxviii 1 ff.

² He is usually assigned to the age of the Antonines.

³ See n. on 354.

However interesting the discovery of the new fragments may be, they will scarcely enhance the reputation of the poet. The dramatic value of the play is insignificant, and the comic relief not greatly exhilarating. It is fair to admit that the more amusing scenes probably occurred in the latter part of the play, when Hermes displayed his cunning and his wit in tricking and conciliating his accuser². But the part which is preserved is less lively and entertaining than the Cyclops, which has hitherto been our only example of the satyric drama. Yet, although it is impossible to rate highly the importance of the play as we know it, we must beware of pronouncing a final judgment on what is actually a torso, more particularly as the recovered fragment has merits of its own which may be pleaded in mitigation of an adverse verdict. Chief among these are directness of purpose and clearness of outline, which, allied in general to a plainness of diction suitable to the simplicity of the action³, leave an impression of natural grace and exhibit in a less familiar sphere a fresh specimen of Attic versatility.

By a curious accident the lyrical parts of the Ichneutae have been mutilated to an extent much exceeding the losses of the dialogue; but enough of them remains to show that they resembled the choruses of the Cyclops in being far less elaborate than the lyrics of tragedy. It seems that Sophocles, perhaps even to a greater degree than Euripides, avoided any attempt at elevation of style in compositions of this character. The lyrical metres, also, are of a simple kind, being mostly variations of the iambic type with some admixture of dochmiacs and anapaests. In general the style of writing is less colloquial than in the Cyclops. If the exclamations are left out of account, the only obvious colloquialisms are τοῦτί (114) and ναὶ μὰ Δία (112)⁴. There is also less

¹ Apollod. 3. 115, and schol. Hom. O 256 follow the hymn in this respect: see however the ὑπόθεσις to Pind. Pyth. p. 1, 12 Drachm., Serv. Verg. Aen. 4. 242.

² Perhaps he stole Apollo's bow and arrows as in Hor. Carm. 1. 10. 11 (no doubt after Alcaeus) viduus pharetra | risit Apollo, schol. Hom. l.c., Philostr. imag. 1. 26. The same suggestion is made by Kurfess in Mnem. xli 111 f.

³ Wilamowitz (p. 460) remarks that 'die harmlose Lustigkeit erfreulicher wirkt als der Witz des Euripides.'

⁴ See however 38, 121 ff., 127, 136, 162, 255, 331, 393.

freedom in the metre of the iambs: Porson's canon is violated in 333, as against several more serious infringements in the Cyclops; and whereas eighteen instances of the licence admitting the introduction of the anapaest into other feet than the first have been counted in the *Cyclops*¹, there is only one—and that doubtful—in the Ichneutae (122). It is rather in the nature of the thoughts expressed than in respect to vocabulary or structure that the style deviates from the normal character of Sophoclean tragedy.

The appearance of fr. 294 N.² as v. 275 f. is conclusive evidence on the question of authorship. Wilamowitz specifies as marks of Sophoclean origin the use of ὀλβίζειν in 210, of ἀπονοσφίζω in 131, and of εὔδειν in 159; and to these should at least be added νεωρής in 150, and μόνον in 49. General impressions are less to be trusted, but I think that few will hesitate on consideration to acquiesce in the judgment of Wilamowitz, that the play reflects Sophocles' earlier manner, and that the occasional harshness and want of polish must be set down to τὸ πικρὸν καὶ κατὰ τεχνον which he himself recognized as a blemish of immaturity³. Some might go further and contend that there is here and there a tendency towards bombast which shows that he has not yet shaken himself free from the influence of Aeschylean ὄγκος; and it will be readily admitted that the harmonious blend of mellowness and lucidity to which he ultimately attained is hardly perceptible in these fragments. But Wilamowitz finds unmistakable signs of an early date in certain definite peculiarities of technique; that is to say, (1) there is no occasion for the presence of three actors on the stage at the same time; (2) no verse of the dialogue is broken between two speakers⁴; (3) the absence of strophic responsion from the opening chorus is comparable with similar features in the Septem and the Eumenides; (4) the alternation of lyrics with ordinary dialogue and stichomythia in the scene between Cyllene and the chorus finds its nearest parallel in the ultimately successful attempts of Athena to placate the Eumenides in the Aeschylean play⁴.

It may be remarked in passing that the date of the Cyclops is

¹ Haigh, Tragic Drama, p. 391s.

² Plut. de virt. prof. 7 p. 79 B.

³ But see vv. 99, 199.

⁴ If it is rightly inferred from Pacuvius (293 n.) that Euripides imitated this play in the Antiope, that circumstance would not assist the determination of the date, since it is certain that the Antiope was one of the latest plays (perhaps 408: Dieterich in Pauly-Wissowa VI 1266). Equally inconclusive is the argument which Wilamowitz deduces from the statement that Sophocles himself played the lyre in the Thamyras (p. 178), namely, that Sophocles took the part of Hermes, and that consequently the play must have belonged to his youth. Robert prefers to suppose for similar reasons that the poet represented Apollo.

quite uncertain, and has been fixed by some critics earlier than 438¹. If that view were correct, the date of the Ichneutae would be put still further back; for the priority of the latter play is assured, apart from general considerations pointing the same way, by the freedom exercised by Euripides both in the division of his lines between two speakers, and in the employment of three actors during the same scene.

The action takes place on the barren slopes of Mt Cyllene, and the entrance to the cave of Maia was the central point to which the attention of the spectators was directed. Robert² has suggested that, since the early part of the play seems to indicate that no hut or cave was visible amid the mountain solitudes, Cyllene must be supposed to have suddenly appeared from an underground cavern³ by means of the stage device known as Χαράωνιοι κλίμακες. The same critic holds that there was no back-scene, and that the πάγος was represented in the middle of the orchestra, as is supposed to have been the case with the Supplices of Aeschylus. But the scene of satyr-plays was for obvious reasons not infrequently located in the open country, and nothing is discernible with regard to the scenery of the Ichneutae which either supports or tells against the hypothesis of an early date.

From the technical point of view the discovery of a dialogue of some length composed in iambic tetrameter acatalectic metre (291 ff.) is remarkable. Nothing of the same kind is found elsewhere in Greek drama, but the iambic octonarii of Roman comedy furnish an exact parallel. In both cases the diaeresis at the end of the first dimeter is sometimes observed and sometimes neglected; the former type is the more frequent in Plautus, the latter in Terence. It is worthy of notice that both varieties occur in the Greek lyric fragments: contrast Alc. fr. 9 with Alca. fr. 56.

It is convenient at this point to call attention to an obscurity in the story of the play which awaits explanation. Part of the reward promised by Apollo to Silenus and the satyrs was the restoration of their freedom (57, 158), and it appears that in the sequel the promise was fulfilled (445). What then was the nature of their slavery? Wilamowitz⁴ refers in this connexion to the obscure passage (218 ff.) in which Cyllene mentions their master as formerly wont to follow in the train of Dionysus, wearing the fawn-skin and wielding the thyrsus. He declines to guess at his identity, but conjectures that it was disclosed

¹ Kaibel in Herm. xxx 71 ff.

² Herm. XLVII 536 ff.

³ See n. on v. 282, and J. E. Harrison, l.c. p. 139.

⁴ p. 454.

on the occasion when the slaves were liberated. Nevertheless, he candidly admits that the audience do not seem to have required any explanation to be given concerning the slavery in question. Now it is true that, as in the Cyclops of Euripides, it was not uncommon for dramatic purposes to represent the satyrs as in the thrall of some ogre or demonic being, and it was obviously a useful expedient to account for their presence at the scene of action. Examples of such bondage are mentioned in the Introductory Notes to the Amycus, the Heracles at Taenarum, the Cedalion, and the Pandora. But it is scarcely credible that this kind of durance would have been employed as an element of the plot without a single word of explanation. Apollo expects to find the satyrs among the inhabitants of the countryside (35), and their slavery is apparently assumed as a matter of course. In such circumstances the natural inference would be that the satyrs here as elsewhere (Cycl. 709) are the slaves of Dionysus. This is the inference which Robert actually adopts; and he is obliged in consequence to assume that a line has been lost after 220. The hypothesis also involves the necessity of explaining why Silenus and the satyrs desired to be released from the joyous service of Dionysus. Robert recognizes the difficulty, and meets it by suggesting that the liberation of the chorus was a constant element in the dénouement of a satyr-play, and that, by an encroachment of the actual conditions of stage-management upon the story of the events enacted on the stage, the chorus were released at the end of the day's acting, i.e. after the production of the satyr-play, from their engagement to the Choregus or the Archon. That is the πόνος from which Silenus and the satyrs are here set free. In course of time, he thinks, the device staled, or the public became too fastidious to be satisfied with it; but, in order to sustain the custom, a mythological servitude (as in the Cyclops) was invented for each occasion. Whether this bold guess will meet with general acceptance, time will show; but it is by no means free from objection. One might be willing not to lay stress upon the fact that, if the text of 218 ff. is sound, the δεσπότης is distinguished from the god, but it is surely pertinent to enquire how Apollo could have promised to set free the bondsmen of Dionysus. He had received, so far as we know, no commission to that end, and it is idle to think of him as using his influence, unless indeed he represented Dionysus in some fuller sense than is usually recognized. But the relations of the satyrs with Apollo rather suggest that he himself is the master to whom their obedience must be rendered. Nor would it be altogether surprising that among the wooded hills of Arcadia the satyrs should temporarily transfer their allegiance from the wine-god to the huntsman's patron deity¹. We need not dwell on the fact that Apollo Nomios, the protector of flocks and herds, was known in Arcadia as the son of Silenus², except as evidence that in his rural aspect he did not disdain an association with the satyrs. That the satyrs should, at the bidding of the Hunter, assume the functions of keen-scented hounds³, is in accordance with their constant fellowship with the huntsman Pan, as well as with their own proclivities⁴. None the less might they be expected to welcome the prospect of release from the obligation of service, which is held out as the reward of success on the present occasion⁵. Lastly, it may be observed that the subjection to Apollo is not necessarily inconsistent with the devotion which they owe to Dionysus. Besides the numerous points of contact between their worship⁶, the gods themselves are identified by Euripides in the Lycymnius (fr. 477): δέσποτα φιλόδαφνε Βάκχε, παῖαν Ἀπολλων εὐλυρε. And, if we are prepared to admit that Apollo was the δεσπότης of v. 218, it is not incredible that the god whom Aeschylus (fr. 341) addressed as ὁ κισσεὺς Ἀπόλλων, ὁ Βακχεύς, ὁ μάντις, should wear the fawn-skin and wield the thyrsus at the head of the other members of the Bacchic rout⁷.

314

Col. i

ΑΠΟΛΛΩΝ

[.]ν ἀγγέλλω [β]ροτοῖς
[.]δῶρ' ὑπισ]χνούμαι τελεῖν

314. 1 ἀγγελω in ἀγγέλλω corr. pap.²

314. 1 ff. Hunt supplies πᾶσιν θεοῖς καὶ πᾶσιν as the opening words of Apollo's speech, comparing vv. 10 and 14: somewhat less abrupt would be ἀκούει' ἤδη' πᾶσιν. But since the conditions seem to demand that the new clause, of which ὑπισχνούμαι is the principal verb, should commence at the beginning of v. 2 (τῷ τ' ἐξενεῖν Mekler), it is more likely that the object of ἀγγέλλω (καινὸν μῦθον or the like) found its place in v. 1. The opening of the Alkestis shows that it is not necessary to suppose that the name of Apollo appeared in v. 3, and ἀπό-προθεν rather requires some such supplement as Mekler's χρυσᾷ κλαπυσῶν μοι βοᾶν. Rossbach, accepting v. 1 as restored in the ed. pr., supplies τῷ τ' ἐργον ἤδ' δ. in 2, and εἰ' ἐγγύθεν τις εἶδεν εἰ' in 3. But the result is unsatisfactory. It is not absolutely certain that v. 1 was the first of the play (see cr. n. on v. 94); but Hunt gives good reasons for considering it probable.

¹ For Apollo ἀγρευτής see O.C. 1091, Herond. 3. 34 Ἀπολλων ἀγρεῦ, Jebb on Bacchyl. 15. 6.

² Clem. Alex. protr. 2. 28, p. 24 P., Porphy. vit. Pyth. 18, Cic. n.d. 3. 57.

³ Pollux 5. 10.

⁴ Anth. Pal. 11. 194, 4.

⁵ 68 ff.

⁶ See Wernicke in Pauly-Wissowa II 35.

⁷ For further discussion of the various points involved see n. on 218 ff.

[.] ἄ]πόπροθεν.
 5 [.] οὐ[.] δύσ]λοφον φρενὶ
 [.] τα[.] βο]ύς ἀμολγάδας
 [μός]χους [.] α πορτίδων
 [.] ταφρ[.] ν ἰχνοσκοπῶ
 [λαθ]ραῖ ἰόν[τ] βου]στάθμου κάπης
 [ἀφα]νῶς τεχνα[.] ἐ]γὼ οὐκ ἂν ψόμην
 10 [οὐτ' ἂν] θεῶν τιν' οὐτ' ἔφημ]έρων βροτῶν 10
 [δραῖσ]αι τόδ' ἔργ[ον ὦδε] πρὸς τόλμαν πεσεῖν.
 [ταύτ] οὖν ἐπείπερ [ἔμα]θον, ἐκπλαγεῖς ὄκνω

5 α[in marg. add. pap.² 7 διασ[in marg. add. pap.² 8 in marg. adscripta λα[supra οὐ νη[| ἰόντα τῆλε Hunt: fort. ἰόντων 9 τέχνασιν· ὡς Hunt: fort. τεχνάσματ' ἄλλ' 11 τόλμην pap.

4 ff. 'Something like δεινὸν γὰρ ἔστ' ἐμῇ δὲ δύσλοφον may have stood in l. 4' (Hunt). But the connexion with the following line is doubtful, and the acc. βούς seems to require for its government a verb of stealing or losing. The latter is perhaps the easier to work in: e.g. δεινὸν γὰρ ἄλγος ἡδὲ δύσλοφον φρενὶ (so Mekler) | ἐπεισ' ἀφαιρεθέντι. Hunt is probably right in supposing that the cattle are divided as 'milk-kine,' calves, and heifers, but the restoration of v. 6 is not easy. The conjectures of Wilamowitz τε καὶ νέων νόμωμα (perhaps too long) and νεανίεσμα are condemned by their halting metre, and Mekler's τε πῖον τ' ἀγλάισμα is not convincing.

7 ff. are restored by Wilamowitz thus: ἀπαντα φρούδα καὶ μάτην... | λαθραῖ ἰόντα τῆλε. Murray suggests τάφρων ὑπερθε νῦν in v. 7. I should prefer ἐπεισ' ἀφροῦρων ἀρπαγῇ (cf. Ovid's incustoditae). Hunt supplies τέχνασιν· ὡς in v. 9, but the dative is somewhat harsh without any previous mention of the agents. Perhaps we should read λαθραῖ ἰόντων...τεχνάσματ' ἄλλ', and render: 'the stealthy artifices of men who have travelled unseen far from the byre.' ἄλλὰ is more suitable than ὡς to the sequence of thought.—ἂν ψόμην | οὐτ' ἂν...πεσεῖν. It may be that the first ἂν belongs to ψόμην, and the second to πεσεῖν, but it is certain that both do not belong to ψόμην, although both may belong to πεσεῖν. Cf. Ar. Thesm. 524 τὰδε γὰρ εἰπεῖν τὴν παροῦργον...οὐκ ἂν ψόμην ἐν ἡμαῖν | οὐδὲ τολμῆσαι ποτ' ἂν. See the discussion of this question in the n. on

Eur. Hel. 1619. In Lys. 31. 1 ἂν clearly goes with the infinitive; and O. C. 748, Antiph. 3 γ 1, id. 5. 69, Thuc. 8. 66, Xen. mem. 3. 4. 7, Dem. 9. 68, Plat. Theaet. 144 A, as well as Eur. Her. 1355, seem to require a similar explanation. But I would again put forward the suggestion that in such cases the influence of ἂν may extend to both verbs; and this must be so in Plat. rep. 443 E εἰ δέοι ἡμᾶς ἀνομολογεῖσθαι...τὴν ἂν οἶοι οἰσθῆναι τοῦτο αὐτὸν δρᾶσαι; and in Xen. mem. 1. 5. 1, unless we are prepared to admit that οἶομαι may be followed by an aorist infinitive representing future time.

11 τόλμαν: see cr. n. The evidence of our MSS is strongly in favour of the forms τόλμα and τόλμαν in tragedy, and they are confirmed by metre. On the other hand τόλμην is unsupported, although it was recognized by Phrynichus (p. 114, 20 de B.=Bekk. anecd. p. 66, 23).—Πεσεῖν. The nearest parallel in Sophocles is Trach. 705 ὥστ' οὐκ ἔχω τάλανα ποί γνῶμης πέσω. Euripides uses πεσεῖν ἐς c. acc. more freely, generally as a periphrasis expressing somewhat more forcibly what might have been rendered by the aor. inf. of the verb corresponding to the abstract noun (τολμῆσαι, ἐρασθῆναι, etc.). So εἰς ἔρωτα πίπτειν (= 'to fall in love') Eur. fr. 138, and c. gen. I. T. 1172, Bacch. 812; ἐς φόβον πεσόντε Phoen. 69; εἰς ἔρην πίπτειν fr. 578. Occasionally it may be held that πεσεῖν retains the sense of to yield or give way, as in Eur. El. 982 εἰς ἀνανδρίαν πεσεῖν or Or. 696 εἰς ὀργὴν πεσεῖν (contrast Tr. fr. adesp. 80).

[ζητῶ] ματεύω, παντελὲς κήρυγμ' ἔχων
 [θεοῖ]ς βροτοῖς τε μηδέν' ἀγνοεῖν τάδε.
 15 [. . . .] υθία γὰρ ἐμμανὴς κυνηγετῶ. 15
 [. . . .] ὦν δ' ἐπήλθ[ο]ν φ[ύ]λα τ[οῦ] παντὸς στρατ[οῦ]
 [. . . .] τισ[.] . [.]
 [.] λ[.] σ[.]
 20 [.] ισ[.] κιο[.]
 [τ]ὰ Θεσσαλῶν [.] ἔπειτα [δὲ] 20
 Βοιωτίας τε γ[ῆ]ς]ς [πό]λ[ι]ς, [ἔπει]τα δ[.] . [.]

desunt versus fere quattuor

Col. ii [.]ς Δωρικο[.]
 [.] γεί[τον], ἐνθ[εν]

13 ζητῶ Wilamowitz: στείχω Hunt | ματεύω ex ματεύων corr. pap. 14 τάδε: ο (i.e. τότε) suprascr. p.² 15 ἐμμανὴς ex ἐμμανεῖς corr. pap. 16]τον in marg. add. pap.² 1. sqq. cum ex duobus fragmentis confecta sint, de singulorum sede minus constat 22 ο" (i.e. οὐτως) habet in marg. pap. post v. 23 desunt fere quattuor versus

13 ζητῶ ματεύω: for the rhetorical asyndeton see on Eur. Phoen. 1193. Diehl, quoting O. C. 211, thinks that ματεύων (cr. n.) may be right.—παντελὲς is perhaps rather authoritative than universal: that is to say, it may be compared with Ant. 1163 λαβῶν τε χώρας παντελῆ μοναρχίαν.—κήρυγμ' ἔχων = κηρύσσων: see on fr. 210, 48. As a verb of commanding it is followed by the inf. with μή: the form of the proclamation was μηδεὶς ἀγνοεῖτω. Cf. Ant. 192 ff.

15 Wilamowitz ingeniously supplied ἀκολουθία from fr. 990, as if ἀκολουθία were the equivalent of δῖωξις. The use of the word in hunting may be inferred from Xen. Cyneg. 10. 5, where reading and interpretation are alike doubtful. So far as the sense goes, Murray's δυσπευθία is to be preferred. πολυμυθία might also be suggested: 'distracted by varying rumours.'

16—30 described Apollo's journey to Cyllene. Accident has preserved the geographical names which establish this, and little or nothing beyond. The remnants of vv. 18—23 are contained in two separate fragments: for their position see Hunt's note. The herds of the god which Hermes plundered were grazing in Pieria, according to h. Herm. 70 and Apollod. 3. 112. At any rate, Thessaly was the traditional scene, and Anton. Lib. 23 describes them as being in the same pastures as the herds of Admetus. Therefore it is extremely unlikely that Sophocles put them anywhere else. If so, there does not seem to be any good reason for introducing the name of Thrace or of the Thracians into these lines, and I hesitate to accept Wilamowitz's Θρακῶν in 16 with ἀλλ' οὐτις in 17, or Hunt's alternative Θρηκίω in 19 with σπεύδων in 16. In any case, the combination Θρακῶν φύλα τοῦ π. στρατοῦ, 'the tribes of the whole host of Thracians,' is a clumsy one, and I should prefer to begin with ἀνδρῶν (or βροτῶν) and to take τοῦ παντὸς στρατοῦ with what follows, adopting (ex gr.) Murray's ζητῶν τίς. For στρατός = λεώς see Jebb on Trach. 795.

21 f. Hunt printed the supplements of Wilamowitz Θεσσαλῶν τ' ἐγκαρπα πέδι' and γῆς πολυκτῆτους.

28 Δωρικο no doubt marks the passage to the Peloponnese. Similarly [.....] ἦκω ξυν[.]α[.....] 30

 [.....] Κνλ[.]λήνης τε δύ[.]σβατον
 5 [.....] τε χῶρον ἐς δ' ὕ[.....]
 [ὥς εἶτε ποιμὴν εἴτ' ἀγρωστή[.]ρων τις ἦ
 [μαριλοκαυ[.]τῶν ἐν λόγῳ παρ[.]ίσταται
 [ἦ τῶν ὀρ[.]είων νυμφογεννή[.]του γένους 35
 [θηρῶ]ν τίς ἐστι, πᾶσιν ἀγγέλ[.]λῳ τάδε,
 10 [.....] ὦρα τοῦ Παιῶνος ὅστις ἀ[.]ν λάβῃ,
 [.....] τὸ χρῆμα μισθός ἐσθ' ὃ κε[.]ίμενος.

32]θ[in marg. add. pap.²

add. pap.²

34 μαριλοκαυτῶν suppl. Wilamowitz |]ν in marg.

37 τὸν φῶρα τῶν (τῶν Wilamowitz) Hunt: fort. τὰ ἔλωρα

38 τῷδ' αὐτόχρομα Hunt

Anton. Lib. 23, after making Hermes pass through Boeotia (v. 22) and Megaris, brings him directly to the Peloponnese by way of Corinth. For the adjective cf. O. C. 695 ἐν τῇ μεγάλῃ Δωρίδι νάσῳ Πέλοπος. The schol. on O. T. 773 interprets Δωρίς as Πελοποννησιακή.

30 Mekler plausibly suggests ξὺν τάχει.

32 f. Wilamowitz was scarcely justified in altering ἐς to εἰ: εἰ δ' ὀληβάτης ἐνταῦθα ποιμὴν. Unless, however, δ' is an error for θ', which the marginal comment (cr. n.) by no means proves, a new sentence must begin here, which it is not easy to adjust agreeably with the context. Some case or compound of ὄλη seems inevitable, but would require a qualification. There does not seem to be enough room in 33 for ἐς δ' ὄλην μολῶν | τῇδ' εἶτε κτέ.—It is unnecessary to omit the σ of ἀγρωστήρων, although there is no other example of the form. For ἀγρώστης: ἀγρώτης see on fr. 94.

34 μαριλοκαυτῶν, a brilliant conjecture of Wilamowitz from fr. 1067.—ἐν λόγῳ παρ[.]ίσταται, 'is at hand to hear my words,' supports the soundness of the MS reading in Phil. 319 τοῖςδε μάρτυς ἐν λόγοις, which has been the object of some suspicion.

35 νυμφογεννήτου. For the relationship between nymphs and satyrs see Hes. fr. 44 Rz. ἐξ ὧν (sc. the daughters of Hekateros [?]) and the daughter of Phoroneus) οὐρεῖαι Νύμφαι θεαὶ ἐξεγένοντο, | καὶ γένος οὐτιδανῶν Σατύρων καὶ ἀμυχανοεργῶν. Here satyrs and nymphs are children of the same parents, but the anonymous satyr-play published in Ox. Lit. VIII 63 (fr. 1, 7) agrees with the present passage, describing the satyrs as παῖδες δὲ νυμφῶν, Βακχίου δ' ὀπηρέται. Silenus, the lover of the nymphs (inf. 149), is their father. Yet satyrs are sometimes themselves joined in wedlock with nymphs (Ov. Fast. 3. 409); while the Sileni are children of the Naiads (Xen. sympr. 5. 7). In Nonn. 14. 113 the satyrs are the sons of Hermes and Iphthime, the daughter of Dorus. See further on 218 ff.

37 The obvious supplement τὸν φῶρα does not fit τοῦ Παιῶνος, and Wilamowitz substituted τῶν for τοῦ in consequence. But it is not satisfactory to alter the text in order to justify even so plausible a restoration of the lost letters. Hunt suggests τὰ δῶρα...ἀρνυταί as an alternative, but admits that τὰ δῶρα scarcely fills the gap. It is perhaps possible that θαῦλα (written τὰ ἔλωρα) might stand here: cf. Hom. Σ 93.—Παιῶν as well as Παιάν (O. T. 154) is a familiar ἐπίκλησις of Apollo: for an attempt to connect it with Paconia see C. R. xxvi 249. It is worth remarking that Usener (Götternamen, p. 154) found in Sophocles the earliest identification of Paion and Apollo. But it is curious that Apollo should refer to himself by this title, especially as the circumstances have no connexion with his functions as the Healer.

38 τῷδ' αὐτόχρομα was restored by Hunt, but αὐτόχρομα does not mean 'forthwith,' and is not obviously appropriate to the context. For its special use to mark a pun (like ἐτύμως etc.) see Neil on Ar. Eq. 78. Probably then we should recognize another instance of τὸ χρῆμα, used vaguely as in 44 and 136, and preceded by a participle such as ἀνύσας or even εὐρών.

ΣΙΑΗΝΟΣ

15 [ἔα· τὰ] σοῦ φωνήμαθ' ὡς ἐπέκλουν
[βοῶ]ντος ὀρθίοισι σὺν κηρύγμασ[ι, [σ]πουδῇ τὰδ' ἥ πάρεστι πρεσβύτῃ [μαθών, [σ]οί, Φοῖβ' Ἀπολλον, προσφιλῆς εὐε[ργέτης θέλων γενέσθαι τῷδ' ἐπεσσύθην δρ[όμῳ,] ἄν πως τὸ χρῆμα τοῦτό σοι κυνηγ[έ]σω.
τ[ὸ] γὰρ γέ[ρα]ς μοι κείμενον χρ[υ]σο[σ]τεφέ[ς] 45
μά[λι]στ' ἐπιστολ[αῖ]σι π[ροσθέσθ]αι χρεώ[ν], 20 παῖδας δ' ἐμ[οῦ]ς ὅσοισι [...]ανε[.]βα[.] . [...]
· [·] [·]ν εἵπερ ἐκτε[λ]εῖς ἅπερ λέγεις.

39 ἔα· τὰ suppl. Mekler 45 sq. supplevi 47 οσσοισι ex οσσοισι corr. pap.²

39 la. rd. I have accepted Mekler's supplement (see cr. n.), since ᾠ Φοῖβε of the ed. pr. is admittedly too long, and is not required so shortly before 42. For the unusual position of the pronoun see Kuehner-Gerth § 464, 4 anm. 2.

41 σπουδῇ with its relative clause belongs to ἔκκευσθαι, and the hyperbaton of τάδε, which of course goes with μαθών, need cause no difficulty. There is a similar case in O. T. 1251 χῶπῳ μὲν ἐκ τῶνδ' οὐκέτ' οἶδ' ἀπόλλυται: see also on Eur. Hel. 710.

44 κυνηγέω: cf. 75 ἐκκυνηγέσαι. If these forms come from κυνηγεῖν, a verb not found in any text earlier than Aristotle, the short vowel is very remarkable, and they must be added to the list which contains αἰνέσω, καλέσω, ποθέσω, πονέσω and others. Several of these are usually explained as analogical products (ἐκἀκείνα: ἐτέλεον): see Weir Smyth, Ionian Dialect, p. 489 ff., Brugmann, Comp. Gr. iv pp. 296, 380. Another suggestion, however, has been put forward by P. Maas (B. ph. W. 1912, 1075) on the strength of two statements by grammarians, which Lobbeck (Paralip. p. 438) refused to credit. See Phryn. praep. soph. p. 84, 1 de B. κυνηγετῆιν (rightly, as it now seems, corrected to κυνηγέττειν by Buttmann): διὰ δυοῖν ᾗ λέγουσιν. Theognost. ap. Cram. anecd. Ox. ii p. 143, 20 τὰ διὰ τοῦ ὅσων ῥήματα, πύρρως, ἐρέσως, ἀνθέσως, κυνηγέσω. Maas points out the exact parallelism between ἐρέσαι (Hom. μ. 444): ἐρέτης, εἰρεστή: ἐρέσαι and κυνηγέσαι: κυνηγέτης, κυνηγέσιον: κυνηγέσαι. We must, therefore, conclude that Sophocles employed the older κυνηγέσσειν as well as the newer formation κυνηγεῖν (Αἰ. 5), which in its turn gave way to κυνηγεῖν.

45 ff. The sequence of thought appears to be, 'I am ready to assist; for I expect my services to be well rewarded. And my sons shall aid..., if only you will keep your promise.' The speaker's object is to bring Apollo to business. In this sense I have endeavoured to restore 45 f. τὸ γὰρ γέρας was admitted by Hunt to be a possible reading, but was rejected as unsuitable. For the palaeographical details his note must be consulted. 47 f. are a puzzling problem : if the elision mark in 48 is rightly deciphered, an optative (e.g. στείλαιμ' ἄν) is possible.—'Above all, your behests must be enlarged by the secure reward for me of a golden crown,' κέρμενον : the word must be understood as in Ant. 485 εἰ ταύτ' ἀνατί ηῖδε κείσεται κράτη (Jebb's n.). The prize was fixed or secured for the winner : Pind. Isth. i. 26 ἀλλ' ἐφ' ἐκάστῳ ἔργματι κείτο τέλος, where τέλος is equivalent to γέρας here. The text of the MS χολ·[η]·[-].-ῖρεθαι (and the possibility that another letter follows) perhaps represents an original χρυσοστορέας, as χρυσοστοπάνων appears in some MSS of Pind. Ol. 8. 1. In that passage χρυσο- is figurative, i.e. it expresses the supreme worth of the not intrinsically valuable prizes. Here χρυσο- is literal, and the second member of the compound figurative : the satyrs looked for some reward more solid than a wreath. The ironical application of the compound is well suited to the tone of the passage : cf. 72, 156, 202.—ἐπ' ενδοξαίοις is also possible (cf. Trach. 1254).

- ΑΠ. [.]. [. . .] ω· μόνον ἐμπ[έδου τ]άδ[ε].
 ΣΙ. τὰ[ς βούς ἀπάξω σ]οι· σὺ δ' ἐμπέδον [δόσι]ν. 50
 ΑΠ. [ἔξει σφ' ὁ γ' εὖ] ρῶν ὅστις ἐσθ'· ἐτ[οί]μ[α] δέ.
 25 ΣΙ. [.]ισ . . . [ε.]ζητ[.]
 ΑΠ. [.]εσο . [.]
 Col. iii ΣΙ. [.]
 ΑΠ. [. . .] . α[.] 55
 ΣΙ. τί τοῦτο; πο[ι] λέγ[εις];
 ΑΠ. ἐλεύθερος σὺ [πάν τε γένος ἔσται τέκ]νων.

ΧΟΡΟΣ ΣΑΤΤΡΩΝ

- 5 ἴθ' ἄγε . [.]
 πόδα βά[σιν τε]ν ἀπαπαπ[αί] 60
 ὦ ὦ, σέ τοι [.]
 ἐπιθι κλωπ[.]
 10 ὑπόνομα κ[.]
 διανύτων ὁ[.]
 πατρικὰν γάρ[υν] 65
 πῶς πᾶ τὰ λάθρι[α νύχια]

52 ἀλλ[ότρια] τ[ι] in marg. add. pap.²

65 γῆρ[υν] pap.

59 τὰ ἔχ[υ]ν(η) in marg. add. pap.²

66 διανύχ(ια) a Theone primitus scriptum in marg. add. pap.²

49 σπουδὴν ἐπαινῶ might give the sense required.—Observe the Sophoclean μόνον (fr. 852 n.).

50 δόσιν: H. Richards conjectures λόγον, which would correspond to ἔρπον ἐμπεδῶσομεν in I. T. 790. Some less obvious restoration is then required in 51.

51 ἐτοῖμα, without definite reference ('everything is prepared'), is idiomatic. See Thuc. 2. 3, 10, 98 etc.

56 ποίαν διωρεᾶν ἄλλην is supplied by Hunt (ed. min.).

57 For the servitude of the chorus see Introductory Note.

58 ff. The remains of the choral ode are too slight to reveal the general character of the metre, but dochmiacs are clearly recognizable in 68, 69 and 72. There is a certain degree of similarity to Eur. Cycl. 656 ff. Robert holds that the chorus entered σπουδῶν before the dialogue with Apollo was completed, and that they heard his concluding directions: see on 102.

61 σέ τοι is a common combination in addresses, with λέγω or the like following: Ai. 359, 1228, El. 1445, O. C. 1578. The governing verb is omitted in Ar. Av. 274.

63 ὑπόνομα seems to be used metaphorically (=cunning). The transference is attested by Hesych. IV p. 215 ὑπονομαί· κλοπαί· ὀχετοί.

65 πατρικὰν γάρυν, 'our father's voice,' corresponds to πατρικός λόγος in Plat. Soph. 242 A (the argument of Parmenides).—The MS has γῆρυν here and in 290, but ἐγάρυνε in 244. Several other instances of η where α might have been expected occur (237, 283, 321), and I have followed Hunt (ed. min.) in restoring the Doric form. The difficult question relating to the trustworthiness of our MSS in this respect is thoroughly discussed by Tucker on Aesch. Chor. pp. 246—250.

- 15 κλέμματα ποσσὶ [.]
εἴ πως, ἂν τύχω, πο. [.]
πατρὶ τ' ἐλεύθερον β[.] . . μετ[.]
ξὺν ἅμα θεὸς ὁ φίλος ἀνέτω πόνους προφήνας
ἀρίζηλα χρυσοῦ παραδείγματα.
20 ΣΙ. θεοὶ Τύχη [κ]αὶ δαίμον ἰθυντήριε, τυχ[ε]ῖν με πράγους οὐ δράμῃ ἐπείγεται,

70

68 post hanc v. paragraphum habet pap.

70 litteras σοφίλοσανετω add. pap.²

et ξυν ex συν corr.
mag. add. pap.²

72 ἀρίζηλα in fine v. 71 pap.

73 ε[.] .ιθυντηριε αρ' in

74 πράγους ex πράγους corr. pap.²

67 ποσσὶ is less remarkable than πόδεσι (fr. 240 n.).—The supplement required may have been (ex. gr.) συμπεράνας έχει.

69 is not easily to be restored (see Hunt's n.), more particularly as it is not clear whether the words are connected with the following lines, which are themselves not altogether intelligible, and may be corrupt, as Wilamowitz thinks (p. 455).—βιούν μέτα, Diehl.

70 A. Taking the text as it stands, I would interpret as follows: 'Now that our god has displayed splendid prizes of gold, let him therewithal at our side conclude our labours.' The gold is secure,—a first favour; next, let the quest be short. I write ξὺν ἅμα (rather than συνάμα, which belongs to the Hellenistic age) as the rough breathing of the papyrus seems to indicate, although it might, of course, be an instance of medial aspiration (fr. 582 n.). ξὺν is then adverbial, as elsewhere in Sophocles (Ant. 85 etc.); and ἅμα accompanies the participial clause, as in Xen. anab. 3. 1. 47 καὶ ἅμα ταῦτ' εἰπὼν ἀνέστη and other examples quoted by Kuehner-Gerth II 82.—ἀρίζηλα, used in the larger sense of what is not merely clear, but conspicuous or striking. θαυμαστὴ ἄγαν is Hesych.'s gloss on ἀρίζηλος (i p. 280), perhaps in reference to Hom. Σ 319. ἀρίζηλως shows that the word was influenced by ἥλως, although etymologically distinct from it. L. and S.'s account is defective.—παραδείγματα, here simply things shown, exhibits. Strictly, we must distinguish the derived meanings (1) example, as in O. T. 1193, and (2) sample, as in Ar. Pac. 65.

73 Τύχη is personified as in O. T.

1080 ἐγὼ δ' ἔμμαντὸν παῖδα τῆς Τύχης νέμων | τῆς εὐδιδούσης. Fortune is not here invoked as blind chance contrasted with foresight, although the first beginnings of that sense are to be found in Attic poetry (O. T. 977, Ant. 1158). Rather, she is the divine power to which all human action is subservient, daughter of Prometheia, as Aleman calls her (fr. 62), mightiest of the fates according to Pindar (fr. 41). Cf. Tr. fr. adesp. 506 πάντων τύραννος ἡ τύχη 'στι τῶν θεῶν κτέ. Thus the vague δαίμον ἰθυντήριε should not be understood as referring to Apollo, but as a further description of the same guiding force. Cf. Dio Chrys. 63. 7 οἱ δὲ πηδάλιον ἔδωκαν κρατεῖν (sc. τῇ τύχῃ). . . . τὸ δὲ πηδάλιον δηλοῖ ὅτι κυβερνᾷ τὸν τῶν ἀνθρώπων βίον ἡ τύχη. id. 64. 5. Observe also that the worship of ἀγαθὸς δαίμων was intimately associated at Athens with that of ἀγαθὴ τύχη: see Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 1088, J. E. Harrison, Themis, p. 278, and cf. Pausan. 9. 39. 5.—For the marginal variant see cr. n. I believe that Aristophanes wrote εὐθυντήριε rather than εἰθυντήριε, as restored in the ed. pr. For the constant confusion of εὐθύνω and ἰθύνω and of their cognates, see Eur. Hipp. 1227, Blomfield on Aesch. Pers. 779. Recent critics (e.g. Nauck on Aesch. fr. 200) have inclined to restore the forms in εὐ.

74 τυχεῖν: for the exclamatory infinitive in prayers see Goodw. § 785, Kuehner-Gerth II 19 ff., Tucker on Aesch. Theb. 239.—οὐ: the genitive expresses the object at which an aim is directed or towards which desire moves. The connexion with ἐπείγεται is Homeric: α 309 ἐπειγόμενος περ' ὁδοῖσιν, T 142 ἐπειγόμενος περ' Ἀργεῖος.

- λείαν ἄγραν σύλη[σ]ιν ἐκκυνηγέσαι 75
 Φ[ο]ίβου κλ[ο]παίας βοῦς ἀπεστερημένο[ν].
 [τ]ῶν εἴ τις ὀπτῆρ ἐστι[ν] ἢ κατήκοος,
 25 [ἐ]μοί τ' [ἄ]ν [ε]ῖη προσφιλῆς φράσας τόδε,
 [Φοίβω τ'] ἀνακτι παντελῆς εὐεργ[έ]της.
 [.] α[. .] τ[. .] s τοῦ λό[γο]υ θ' ἅμα[80
 Col. iv μῆνυ[τρα
 XO. ἰὼ σ[ ὑπο[
 δ' οὐδ[
 5 ΣΙ. φησὶν τις, ἥ [85 ἔοικεν ἤδη κ[ ἄγ' εἶα δὴ πᾶς σ[ ῥινηλατῶν ὁσμ[αῖσι
 αὔρας ἐάν πη προ[
 10 διπλοῦς ὀκλάζω[ν]ν 90

77 λ[in marg. add. pap.²
 a (i.e. τάδε) suprascr. pap.²
 Hunt

78 τ'...φράσας Wilamowitz: γ'...δράσας pap. | τόδε:
 79 παντελῆς scripsi: προστελῆς pap., συντελῆς

75 λείαν κτέ. The asyndeton is no doubt intended to emphasize the climax (Kuehner-Gerth II 341).—It may be questioned whether σύλησιν is here concrete, or whether λείαν and ἄγραν are to be taken, as is quite possible, as nomina actionis. On the whole, the idea of discovering the stolen cattle seems to be more prominent than that of punishing the theft. In fact, an abstract noun is sometimes employed, where we should require a concrete: see on Eur. Hel. 50, 1075.

77 τῶν is demonstrative. Cf. O. T. 100 τόν...ὕπὸ σφ' φθίσαν κεραυνῷ.

78 φράσας (see cr. n.) seems to be a necessary correction.

79 προστελῆς (see cr. n.) does not occur elsewhere, and has no obvious meaning. It seems probable, therefore, that the preposition has been copied by mistake from the previous line. Hunt substitutes συντελῆς, 'contributory,' which may well be right, unless we should prefer the more complimentary παντελῆς ('all-effective'). It may be observed that Aeschylus and Sophocles (if we include v. 13) each use the word παντελῆς four times, but it is never employed by Euripides or by Pindar.

80 f. The purport of these lines was to promise the informer a share of the reward.

85 f. are well restored by Hunt: φησὶν τις, ἢ οὐδεὶς φησὶν εἰδέναι τάδε; | ἔοικεν ἤδη καὶ πρὸς ἐργ' ὀρμᾶν με δεῖν. He quotes Eur. I. T. 1072.

87 ἄγ' εἶα supports the reading of the MSS in Ar. Ran. 394, where several editors adopt Bentley's ἀλλ' εἶα, as well as V's reading in Plut. 316.—For the aspiration, which is said to be Attic, see schol. A on Hom. I 262 τῆς δασείας Ἀττικῶς προσελθούσης. Cf. 168, fr. 221, 4.

89 αὔρας, evidently with the meaning scent. Cf. Antiph. fr. 217, 22 (II 105 K.) ξανθαῖσιν ἀβραῖς σῶμα πᾶν ἀγάλλεται, i.e. with the savour of roasting.

90 διπλοῦς ὀκλάζων I should interpret as 'bent double.' Terzaghi supplies πῶδας with διπλοῦς, but the chorus are not exhorted merely to bend their legs. Silenus encourages them to bend over the track, but it seems from 119 that they exaggerated his command by moving along the trail on all-fours. For διπλοῦς in this sense cf. Eur. El. 492 διπλὴν ἀκανθὰν καὶ παλῖρροπον γόνυ. Verg. Aen. II. 645

ὑποσμος ἐν χρῶ. [.]
 οὕτως ἔρευναν καὶ π[.]
 ἅπαντα χρηστὰ κα[.] τε[.].

HMIX. θεὸς θεὸς θεὸς θεός· ἔα [ἔα·

15 ἔχειν ἔοικμεν· ἴσχε· μὴ· ρ[. . . .]τει. 95

HMIX. ταῦτ' ἔστ' ἐκεῖνα τῶν β[οῶ]ν τ[ᾶ] βήματα.

HMIX. σίγ[α]· θεός τις τὴν ἀποι[κία]ν ἄγει.

HMIX. τί δρώμεν, ὦ τᾶν; ἦ τὸ δέον [ἄρ'] ἤνομεν;
 τί; τοῖσ[ι] ταύτη πῶς δοκεῖ;

98 χρῆσθαι a Theone scriptum in marg. add. pap.²

versui adscriptum | alterum ἔα add. Wilamowitz

olim Hunt (littera prima in pap. evanida) 97 σιγ add. pap.² et paragrammum infra positum del.

98 sqq. secundum Wilamowitzium distributi, nisi quod ille chorum trifarium dividit. paragrammos post vv. 98, 99 (bis), 103, 104 habet pap. | ἐτιδ in rasura pap.² tum e delevit (ἐτιδρ[. . .]·) in marg. add. pap.² | ἄρ' ἤνομεν Murray: ἐξήνομεν Wilamowitz

94 ἄ in marg. centesimo

96 βήματα P. Maas: σήματα

duplicatione utrum transfixa dolore (sc. hasta). 12. 926 incidit ietus | ingens ad terram duplicato poplite Turnus. οκλάζειν signifies to crouch, although no doubt it is often applied specifically to squatting on the haunches. Wilamowitz, who reads δίπους, thinks that οκλάζειν should refer to a dog sitting; but how could he then follow the trail?

91 ὑποσμος ἐν χρῶ, scenting closely, i.e. with their noses close to the ground. Cf. Arist. de an. 2. 9. 421^b 11 καὶ γὰρ τούτων ἔνια (i.e. some water animals) πέρρωθεν ἀπαντὰ πρὸς τὴν τροφὴν ὑποσμοζ γινόμενα, —guided by the smell. ὑπήκοος is exactly parallel. The gloss of Hesych. IV p. 216 ὑποσμος· ὁσφραίνωμενος is substantially correct, and may very well, as Wilamowitz thinks, refer to this passage. Cf. Phot. lex. p. 630, 14 ὑποσμος· ὁ ὑπονοῶν τι καὶ ὑποπτεῶν. For ἐν χρῶ cf. Thuc. 2. 84 ἐν χρῶ δὲ παραπλέοντες (ἀντι τοῦ πλησίον schol.).

94 θεός is repeated to mark the excitement. Wilamowitz refers to Eur. Hel. 560 ὦ θεοί· θεός γὰρ καὶ τὸ γινώσκειν φίλων, a passage which shows that even so impersonal a conception as the articular infinitive can be described as θεός. So here θεός is equivalent to θεῖόν τι ἔστιν ἐνταῦθα.

96 μὴ πρόσω πάει, which I formerly suggested, is found to be too long for the gap. Robert has made the same correction independently.

96 Hunt (ed. min.) accepted βήματα from P. Maas: see cr. n. Maas also required ἐκεῖνων for ἐκεῖνα, as in 110.

But ἐκεῖνα ('here are those steps') is more forcible, and would not be precluded even if it were certain that βήματα or ἔχη had not previously been mentioned. Cf. El. 1115 τοῦτ' ἐκεῖν' ἤδη σαφές | πρόχειρον ἀχθος...δέρομαι, ib. 1178 τὸδ' ἔστ' ἐκεῖνα. —I have followed Hunt in the distribution of these lines: Wilamowitz divides the chorus into three sections, for reasons which will be discussed in the n. on 168. Robert, who divides into ἡμιχόρια, discovers three separate speakers in each section, and so finds an argument in favour of the view that the satyric chorus always consisted of 12 members. The tradition is against these subdivisions, but the correct apportionment of the speeches is necessarily doubtful.

97 The exact allusion which is intended is probably irrecoverable. Something in the attitude of the chorus seems to have suggested to their minds the formalities observed on the occasion of the departure of a new colony. Or, as Wilamowitz suggests, they may have been thinking of Cadmus following the cow, or the Theraeans entering Cyrene behind the raven. In any case, θεός must refer to Apollo as the god of colonization, particularly under his title of ἀρχηγέτης. Cf. Pind. Pyth. 5. 60, Thuc. 6. 3.

98 See cr. n. O. T. 157 does not defend ἐξήνομεν which is so unusual that Murray's reading is to be preferred. The letter before ν is doubtful, but there does not appear to be room for ἐλυόνομεν.

HMIX.

δοκεῖ πάνυ.

21 σαφῆ [γ]ὰρ αὐθ' ἕκαστα σημαίνει τάδε. 100

HMIX. ἰδού, ἰδού.

καὶ τοῦπίσημον αὐτὸ τῶν ὀπλῶν πάλι[ν].

HMIX. ἄθρει μάλα.

25 αὐτ' ἐστὶ τοῦτο μέτρον [ἐ]κμε[μαγ]μ[έ]νον.

HMIX. χ[ώ]ρει δρόμῳ καὶ τα[.] ν ἔχου 105

[. . .]οπ[.] [μενος

Col. v ροῖβδημ' ἐάν τι τῶν [ἔσω πρό]ς οὗς [μόλῃ.

ροῖβδος

HMIX. οὐκ εἰσακούω πω [τορῶ]ς τοῦ φθ[έγ]ματος, ἀλλ' αὐτὰ μὴν ἵχ[νη] τε] χῶ στίβος τάδε

102 επισημωμ⁹¹ in marg. add. pap.²Hunt 105 δρομῳ suprascri. pap.²: χετ[] . ι pap. | κα in καi corr. pap.²107 ροῖβδημ' εαν τις ex ροῖβδαιαντι corr. pap.²: ροῖβδοι primitus pap. | ἔσω πρός... μολῃ scripsi: βῶν δι'... λάβῃ Hunt 109 στιβ ex στιλβ corr. pap.

99 δοκεῖ πάνυ: 'I'm quite sure of it.' Cf. Plat. Euthyd. 305 c πρὸς δὲ τῷ εἶναι καὶ δοκεῖν πάνυ παρὰ πολλοῖς, where it may be doubted if Stallbaum was right in connecting πάνυ with πολλοῖς.

100 'For each actual mark, as we see them (τάδε), is a clear proof.' For αὐθ' ἕκαστα see on Eur. Phoen. 494. σημαίνει is used absolutely as in Trach. 345 χῶ λόγος σημαίνεται.

102 The occurrence of αὐτός in 100 and 104 favours the adoption of αὐτό rather than αὐτό. 'Here is the very imprint of their hoofs.' ἐπίσημον, ἐπίσημα are used of the devices stamped on coins. On the other hand, it seems hardly possible that ἐπίσημον, if that word is to be discerned in the marginal note, could express the rolling gait of oxen. Robert, accepting σήματα in 96, supposes that both lines refer to the mark of ownership which Apollo had branded on the hoofs of his cattle, and that this mark had been disclosed, probably in 52 f.

104 ἐκμεμαγμένον: see cr. n. The tense is a serious objection to the reading ἐκμετρούμενον: contrast Eur. fr. 382, 3, where the present expresses customary action (= δὲ ἐκμετρεῖται). Tr.: 'here is a moulding of the very size.'—μέτρον implies that the chorus measured the track with their eyes, and observed its correspondence: cf. Al. 5 μετρούμενον | ἵχνη τὰ κείνου νεοχάραχθ' ὅπως κτέ.

106 Perhaps ἀκροόμενος, if 107 followed immediately, as was probably, though not certainly, the case. The lower margin is broken off, so that the end of the column cannot be fixed.

107 See cr. n. Hunt's restoration is open to two objections. (1) ροῖβδημα is unsuitable, as applied to the lowing of cattle. It is true that Monk read ἐν ροῖβδῇσει βουκολιών in Eur. I. A. 1086 with this meaning, but none of the subsequent critics, except Paley, has agreed with him. ροῖβδημα expresses the whistling of the herdsmen, just as ροῖζος is attributed to shepherds in Hom. ε 315. Following the clue which these passages suggest, I have provisionally restored as above. (2) The usage of tragedy invariably requires δι' ὧτων (ὠτός) in the proposed context: see Aesch. Cho. 54, 449. Soph. O. T. 1387, Ant. 1188, El. 737, 1439, fr. 858. Eur. Med. 1139, Rhes. 294, 566.—ροῖβδος is παρεπιγραφή, and appears to refer to the sound of the lyre which the semi-chorus fails to recognize. Wilamowitz thinks the word could not be so applied: but see on 255. Robert also explains ροῖβδος as the bellowing of the cattle, but objects to Hunt's restoration on the ground that, though the παρεπιγραφή follows 107, the sound had already been heard and correctly interpreted by the first speaker.

109 f. The construction is as follows: αὐτὰ τε ἵχνη καὶ ὁ στίβος [i.e. the indi-

- 5 κείνων ἐναργῇ τῶν β[ο]ῶν μαθεῖν πάρα. 110
 HMIX. ἔα μάλα.
 παλινστραφῇ τοι ναὶ μὰ Δία τὰ βήματα
 ἐς τοῦμπάλιν δέδορκεν· αὐτὰ δ' εἶσιν.
 τί ἐστὶ τοῦτί; τίς ὁ τρόπος τοῦ τάγμα[τος];
 10 εἰς τοῦπίσω τὰ πρόσθεν ἡλλακται, τὰ δ' αὖ 115
 ἐναντί' ἀλλήλοισι συμπ[επλεγ]μένα.
 δεινὸς κυκλισμὸς εἰχ[ε] τὸν βοη[λάτην].
 ΣΙ. τίν' αὖ τέχνην σὺ τήν[δ'] ἄρ' ἐξ[η]γῇρες, τίν' αὖ,

113 εἰς pap. et saepius | αὖ pap., unde δέδορκεν αὖ τὰδ' Hunt
 (i.e. ταυτί) suprascr. pap.² | πράγματος in marg. add. pap.²

114 τοῦτί: α
 118 εὔρες pap.

vidual marks and the entire trail] κείνων τῶν βοῶν πάρα [=παρεῖσι] τάδε ἐναργῇ μαθεῖν. Wilamowitz at one time placed a colon after στίβος, but subsequently preferred a full stop before μαθεῖν. The latter alternative is the better of the two, but there is no reason why the passage should not be continuous.

113 f. ναὶ μὰ Δία occurs also in Eur. Cycl. 555, 558, 586. We may render: 'nay, verily, the footprints are reversed and face in the opposite direction.' ναί, as Shilleto remarked (Dem. de fals. leg. p. 285), serves not so much 'the purpose of affirming the preceding position, as of ushering in the subsequent objection.' Cf. Xen. Cyrop. 1. 6. 29 αὐτὸν γινώσκεις διὰ κακουργίαι τέ εἰσι καὶ... πλεονεξίαι; ναὶ μὰ Δί', ἔφη, θηρίων γε. In men. 2. 2. 11 ναὶ μὰ Δία is a protest against the question, 'why, of course I do.' For the sense cf. h. Herm. 344 τῆσιν μὲν γὰρ βουσίην ἐς ἀσφοδελὸν λειμῶνα | ἀντία βήματ' ἔχονσα κόβης ἀνέφανε μέλαινα. Hunt puts a full stop after βήματα, and adopts the circumflex accent of the papyrus by reading αὖ τὰδ' (see cr. n.). But the arrangement in the text is much better: in English the emphasis would be expressed by 'just look at them.' For the emphatic position of αὐτός cf. Eur. Hel. 421 αὐτὰ δ' εἰκάσαι | πάρεστι ναὸς ἑκβολ' οἷς ἀμπίσχομαι.

114 τοῦτί. The colloquial form, common in Aristophanes, does not occur elsewhere in the text of the tragedians.—τάγματος: a rare word, mostly confined to late prose. But it does not seem right to prefer the more usual and vaguer πράγματος.

115 f. 'The front marks have shifted to the back, and some again are interlaced facing in opposite directions to each other.' They reach a point where the general direction of the trail appears to be reversed, so that the forward marks are now turned the wrong way: besides this, many of the hoof-marks are half obliterated by others going in the reverse direction. The language follows h. Herm. 77 ἀντία ποιήσας ὀπλὰς, τὰς πρόσθεν ὀπισθεν, | τὰς δ' ὀπισθεν πρόσθεν, κατὰ δ' ἐμπάλιν αὐτὸς ἔβαυε (Hermes drives the cows backwards, while he himself walks forwards). Cacus carried out the same trick differently: Verg. Aen. 8. 210 cauda in speluncam tractos versisque viarum | indicibus. Hunt supports συμπεπλεγμένα by quoting Xen. cyn. 5. 6 τὰ ἔχρη ὀρθὰ... τοῦ δ' ἦρος συμπεπλεγμένα. One might also conjecture συμπεφωμένα. Robert takes an entirely different view of this passage. According to him the cunning of Hermes was much more complicated: (1) Some of the cows were driven backwards [112]; (2) others had their front hoofs twisted inwards [115 ἐς τοῦπίσω... ἡλλακται]; (3) others again had their back hoofs twisted outwards [ἐναντί' ἀλλήλοισι]. Since, however, this meaning cannot be extracted from the parallel passage in the hymn, Robert believes that Sophocles was a deliberate innovator. The difficulty arises from a refusal to believe that ἀντία ποιήσας ὀπλὰς in Homer, and ἐς τὸνπίσω τὰ πρόσθεν ἡλλακται in Sophocles, can both be applied simply to the reversal of the direction of the hoofs.

118 f. Hunt, reading κεκλιμένον, places the mark of interrogation at the end of 118. This requires πρόσπαιον (sc. ἐστὶ) to be used in the sense of θαυμαστόν, whereas πρόσπαιος is rather new than strange.

- 15 πρόσπαιον ὧδε κεκλιμ[ένος] κυνηγετῆν
 πρὸς γῆ; τίς ὑμῶν ὁ τρόπος; οὐχὶ μανθάνω. 120 [ἐ]χίνος ὥς τ[ι]ς ἐν λόχμῃ κείσαι πεσών, [ἦ] τις πίθη[κο]ς κύβδ' ἀποθυμαίνεις τινί.
 τ[ι] ταῦτα; π[οῦ] γῆς ἐμάθετ'; ἐν π[οί]ῳ τόπῳ;
 [ση]μήνατ', ο[ὐ] γ[ὰρ] ἴδρις εἰμὶ τοῦ τρόπου.
 20 XO. ὦ [ῥ] ὦ ῥ. 125
 SI. τί τοῦτ' ἰύξεις;] τίνα φοβῆ; τίν' εἰσορᾷς;
 τί δεῖμ' ὅπωπ[ας]; τί ποτε βακχεύεις ἔχων;
 ἀλλ' οὐ τίς ἤχε[ι] κέρχνος ἰμείρε[ις] μαθεῖν;
 τί δῆτα σιγ[ᾶ]θ', οἱ πρ[ὸ] τοῦ λαλίστ[α]τοι;

119 κεκλιμένον Hunt, interrogatione intra v. 118 terminata 122 κύβδα θυμαίνει
 olim Hunt 123 τροπῶι pap.: corr. Wilamowitz 128 vid. comm. | εἰμείρε[ις].
 pap., primum ε del. pap.² 129 σιγᾶθ' οἱ Theonem legisse testatur pap.¹: [σιγ]ᾶτ' ὦ pap.

For the adverb ('so newly bowed to earth') cf. Nic. Theor. 689 εἰ δὲ σύ γε σκύλακας γαλήνης ἢ μητέρα λαιδρῶν | ἀγρεύσαις πρόσπαιον.

121 Just as the proverb μία λόχμη οὐ τρέφει δύο ἐρμᾶκους (Zenob. 5. 11) implies that a bush offers only limited accommodation, so here the satyrs are doubled up as completely as the hedgehog, when he is tucked into a space just large enough for him. The ἐχίνος cunningly conceals himself for purposes of self-defence: cf. Ion Chius fr. 38, 4 στρόβιλος ἀμφάκανθον (Salmasius for ἀμφ' ἄκανθαν) εἰλίξας δέμας | κείται θυγείν τε καὶ δακεῖν ἀμήχανος.

122 The exact intention of the allusion is obscure. ἀποθυμαίνεις, which, if sound, provides the only instance in the text of an irregular anapaest (see p. 230), is an unknown compound, and it is difficult to perceive the relevance of any derivative of θυμαίνω. Wilamowitz suggested that ἀποθυμαίνω was used for ἀποθυμῖαν, and that the latter was a synonym of ἀποπέρδεσθαι. But the double assumption is unwarrantable. Hunt, in order to secure the same meaning, conjectured ἀπιθυμαίνεις from Hesych. 11 pp. 350, 371 s. vv. ἰθυμαίνω and ἰθυμαίνε,—evidence which fails to prove that ἰθυμαίνω could be used for πέρδεσθαι. The associations of κύβδα are different, if we may judge by Ar. Eq. 365, Pac. 897, Thest. 489 (with Blaydes's n.): in other words, it alludes to σχῆμα ἀκόλαστον καὶ ἐταιρικόν (schol. Ar. Lys. 231). Hence I formerly suggested ποθομανῆς on the analogy of ἐρωτομανῆς, but would now prefer πόθον ἐνέλις (Eur. Bacch. 851), as a somewhat easier change and as accounting better for τινί.

123 τί ταῦτα; see on Eur. Hel. 991, and Gildersleeve, Synt. § 132.

125 ὦ ῥ, which recurs at 170, is an exclamation of alarm; not of admiration, as in Ar. Plut. 895, where schol. R remarks: ἐπίρρημα θαυμαστικόν, ὅπερ ἐν τῇ συνηθείᾳ λέγεται.

127 ἔχων is colloquial. It is explained by Kuehner-Gerth II 62 (followed by Starkie on Ar. Nub. 131) as originally transitive (i.e. ἔχων governs τί). Subsequently it became intransitive, as employed in Ar. Ran. 202 οὐ μὴ φλυαρήσεις ἔχων, ib. 512 ληρεῖς ἔχων. It follows that in the fifth century ἔχων was no longer considered to be transitive.

128 f. The supplement of Wilamowitz ἀγχοῦ τις ἔχει κέρχνος was adopted by Hunt in both his editions. In that case, it would seem necessary also to accept ἰμείρω from the same critic; for, as he says, the chorus have not shown any desire to investigate the sound. But we may very well read ἀλλ' οὐ τίς... ἰμείρει μαθεῖν; as in the text, with τί δῆτα (Hunt) in place of τί ἦν; τί in the following line. ἀλλά is idiomatic in introducing a fresh question, as explained by Maetzner on Lycurg. 144.—For κέρχνος see on fr. 279.—The reading of Theon (σιγᾶθ' οἱ) is very much more forcible, as marking the contrast with their former loquacity.

- 25 XO. σ[ίγα μὲν οὖν.] 130
 ΣΙ. τ[ὶν] ἔστ' ἐκεῖθε]ν ἀπονοσ[φίξ]εις ἔχων ;
 XO. ἀ[κουε δῆ.]
 Col. vi ΣΙ. καὶ πῶς ἀκούσ[ω μηδεν]ὸς φωνὴν κλύων ;
 XO. ἐμοὶ πιθοῦ.
 ΣΙ. ἐμ[ὸν] δίω[γμά γ' οὐδα]μῶς ὀνήσετε. 135
 XO. ἀκουσον αὐ τ[ο]ῦ χρ[ήμα]τ[ος] χρόνον τινα,
 5 [ο]ῦ' κ[πλ]αγέντες ἐν[θάδ'] ἐξενίσμεθα ψόφω τὸν οὐδε[ῖ]ς π[ώπο]τ' ἤκουσεν βροτῶν.
 ΣΙ. τί μοι ψ[ό]φον φοβ[εῖσθε] κα[ὶ] δειμαίνετε, μάλθης ἀναγνα σῶ[μα]τ' ἐκμεμαγμένοι, 140
 κάκιστα θηρῶν ὄντ[ες, ἐ]ν [π]άσῃ σκιᾷ 10 φόβον βλέποντες, πάν[τα] δειματούμενοι, ἀνευρα κακόμιστ[α] κἀν[ε]λε[ύθε]ρα

137 'κπλαγ(έντες) Aristophanem, ἐνθάδ' ἐξενίσμεθα Theonem legisse testatur pap.²: π[λ]αγέντες . . ἐξ[.] . γισμεθα (ἐξωργίσμεθα ?) pap. 139 post ψόφον interpunxit pap. 140 ἐκμεμαγμένα Aristophanem legisse testatur pap.³

131 ἀπονοσφίξεις, an ingenious restoration of Wilamowitz, after O. T. 480 τὰ μεσόμελα γὰς ἀπονοσφίζων | μαν-τεῖα, where the verb is glossed by φωνῶν.

135 For the palaeographical data see Hunt's note. The received supplements are not convincing, and the retort suggests the repetition of ἐμοὶ (e.g. ἐμοὶ δ' ἔρουναν).

136 f. ἀκουσον κτέ. 'Listen to the thing for a bit, and hear what a noise....' The subordinate clause introduced by οὐφ takes the place of the acc. rei, which is normally combined with the genitive of the personal object following ἀκούω (audire ex aliquo aliquid). Cf. e.g. Phil. 1273 βούλομαι δέ σου κλῦειν πότερα δέδοκται. For αὐ τοῦ Maas conjectured αὐτός, but surely the article is required with χοήματος. The latter word is used colloquially, just as we say 'the thing,' with a touch of contempt. Cf. 365, and see Neil on Eg. 1219, Starkie on Vesp. 933.—ἐξενίσμεθα is more suitable to the context than ἐξωργίσμεθα, if that was the original reading of the papyrus; but the meaning required ('to be astounded'), which is common in Polybius, has hitherto been regarded as post-classical. M. Ant. 8. 15 αἰσχρὸν ἔστι ξενίσσθαι, εἰ ἡ σὺκὴ σὺκα φέρει.

139 ψόφον φοβείσθε. For the proverbial ψοφόδεῖς see on fr. 61. The stop which is placed after ψόφον in the papyrus must be an error.

140 μάλθης. The substance intended, which is chosen for its compressible character, is described as κηρὸς μεμαλαγμένος (Bekk. anecd. p. 278, 23; cf. Ael. et Paus. fr. 251 a Schw.). See also Sandys on Dem. 46. 11.—Since it appears to be necessary to admit δντες in 141, I have retained ἐκμεμαγμένοι here (see cr. n.) rather than ἐκμεμαγμένα, which is preferred by Hunt.

141 f. κάκιστα is difficult, unless δντα κἄν is read, as I formerly proposed. Hunt states, however, that there is not room for this reading in the lacuna. Contrast 147 κάκιστα θηρίων, and for the grammatical principle see Kuehner-Gerth § 363. We can hardly carry on σώματα, and must suppose that κάκιστα is nominalized like τὰ πρῶτα in Ar. Ran. 421. There is a formal parallel in Thuc. 4. 76 ἔστι δὲ ἡ Χαίρωνεια ἐσχατον τῆς Βοιωτίας. I do not add τ. 138 ἐδόκει γὰρ πολυνότατον τῶν τότε εἶναι (sc. ἡ Λάμψακος), for there τῶν τότε may be neuter. θηρί' conj. Wecklein.—For the sense cf. Shaksp. M. N. D. v. 1. 21 Or, in the night, imagining some fear, | how easy is a bush supposed a bear!

143 ἀνευρα: feeble. Cf. Theopomp. fr. 71 (1752 K.) ἀπνoui, ἀνευρος, ἀσθενής, ἀνέντατος.—ἀκόμιστ[α]: slovenly.

- διακονοῦντες, [σ]ώ[μ]ατ' εἰ[σ]ιδ[ε]ῖν μόνον κα[ὶ] γ[ὰρ] λῶσσα κα[ὶ] φ[αλ]ῆτες, — εἰ δέ που δέη, 145 πιστοὶ λόγοισιν ὄντες ἔργα φεύγετε—15 τοιοῦ[δ]ε πατρός, ὃ κάκιστα θηρίων, οὐ πόλλ' ἐφ' ἥβης μνήματ' ἀνδρείας ὑπο κ[ε]ῖται παρ' οἴκοις νυμφικοῖς ἡσκημένα, οὐκ ἐς φυγὴν κλίνοντος, οὐ δειλ[ο]υμένου, 150
 οὐδὲ φόφοισι τῶν ὀρειτρόφων βοτῶν
 20 [π]τήσσοντος, ἀλλ' αἰ[χ]μαῖσιν ἐξε[ρ]γασμένου

144 σχήματ' maim 150 δειλυνόμενον in marg. Ní(candro) adscriptum: δουλμένου pap. 152 αἰχμαῖσιν scripsi: ἀκαῖσιν Hunt | ἐξεργασμένου ex ἐξεργασμένα
 corr. pap.²

144 σώματα does not seem to be used alone in the contemptuous sense of hulks or carcasses. If, therefore, the conditions permitted, I should have preferred to substitute σχήματ',—mere shapes without substance. Cf. Eur. fr. 25 γέροντες οὐδὲν ἔσμεν ἄλλο πλὴν ψόφος καὶ σχῆμ'. id. fr. 360, 27 μὴ σχήματ' ἄλλως ἐν πόλει πεφνύσθαι. I am glad to find that Robert also is dissatisfied with σώματ', but his conjecture ὅμματ' is no improvement.

145 φαῖτες. Satyric choruses wore the phallus: cf. Eur. Cycl. 439, and see Haigh, *Aitric Theatre*², p. 294. For the comic stage see schol. Ar. Nub. 538.—ἐ...δέη, at a pinch. For the subjunctive with εἰ cf. O. C. 1443, Ant. 710, Ar. Eq. 698. It is not easy to recover the nuance of the construction, or to understand why it was occasionally preferred to the normal uses. Neil (on Eq. l.c.) seems to think that it was paratragoedic in Aristophanes, but it may rather have been the literary survival of an almost extinct colloquialism, like our an't please you. For other examples see Kuehner-Gerth II 474.

147 τοιοῦδε πατρός is isolated. In order to show that it is a continuation of the address from φαῖτες, I have printed ἐ...φεύγετε as a parenthesis.

148 The exploits of Silenus, his wanderings with Dionysus, and his share in the battle with the giants, are recorded in Eur. Cycl. 2—9. Wilamowitz (p. 455) thinks that the present passage refers rather to hunting adventures (Jagdabenteuer): see on 152.

149 οἴκοις νυμφικοῖς: i.e. in the caves of the nymphs. Cf. Hom. h. Arkt. 262 τῇσι δὲ Σίληνοί τε καὶ εὐσκο-

πος Ἀργεφόντης | μίσχοντ' ἐν φιλότῃι μυχῷ σπείων ἐροέντων.

150 ἐς φυγὴν κλίνοντος, giving way to flight. For the use of κλίνω cf. Polyb. 1. 27. 8 τῶν περὶ τὰ μέσα Καρχηδονίων ἐκ παραγγέλματος κλινάντων πρὸς φυγὴν. Aristid. 1 p. 178 ἐπεὶ δ' ἔκλινε τὰ πράγματα. In Eur. Supp. 704 ἐκλινε γὰρ κέρας | τὸ λαὸν ἡμῶν the verb might be intransitive, although the editors are probably right in making κέρας the object.—δειλυνόμενον (see cr. n.) is rather more pointed than δουλυνόμενον, which requires to be defined (e.g. by τῇ γνώμῃ). Wilamowitz compares ἀγροῦσθαι, γαυροῦσθαι, etc.

152 αἰχμαῖσιν. The plural indicates different occasions, and by the use of the word the speaker does not so much refer to a definite weapon as to martial achievements in general. Thus the meaning is equivalent to vi et armis, or practically to 'in battle.' Cf. Eur. fr. 16 λαμπροὶ δ' ἐν αἰχμαῖσι Ἀρεὸς ἐν τε συλλόγοις. Phoen. 1273 αἰχμῆν ἐς μίαν καθέστατον. Soph. Phil. 1307 κακοὶς | ὄντας πρὸς αἰχμῆν. See also Wilamowitz on Eur. Her. 158.—Hunt gives ἀκαῖσιν with a colon after ἐξεργασμένου, though I do not understand how his reading admits of the translation 'but did deeds of strength.' But it is surely far more natural to suppose that the object of ἐξεργασμένου is the antecedent to αἰ. (i.e. deeds which) in 153, than that the relative looks back to μνήματα in 148. Nevertheless, Wilamowitz also takes μνήματα to be the immediate antecedent of αἰ. Both he and Robert infer from the text that Silenus is boasting not of his martial exploits, but of his prowess as a hunter, i.e. (I suppose) the

- [ἀ] νῦν ὑφ' ὑμῶν λάμ[πρ' ἀ]πορρυπαίνεται
 [ψ]όφῳ νεώρει κόλακ[ι] ποιμένων π[ο]θέν;
 [τί] δὴ φοβείσθε παῖδες ὥς πρὶν εἰσιδεῖν, 155
 25 πλοῦτον δὲ χ[ρ]υσόφαντον ἐξαφί[ε]τε ὃν Φοῖβος ὑμῖν εἶπε κ[ἀ]νδεξάτο,
 καὶ τὴν ἐλευθέρωσιν ἦν κατήνεσεν
 Col. vii ὑμῖν τε κἄμοι; ταῦτ' ἀφέντες εὐδετε.
 εἰ μὴ ἵναοστήσαντες ἐξιχνεύσε[τε] 160
 τὰς βοῦς ὅπῃ βεβᾶσι καὶ τὸν βουκόλῳ,

153 ὑμῶν ex ἡμῶν corr. pap.² | ὑπορρυπαίνεται praetulit Hunt | post hunc v. lacunam indicat Wilamowitz 155 τί supplevi: δν Wilamowitz 159 ἀφέντες ex αφαντες corr. pap.²

object of ἐξεργασμένου 'having destroyed' is βοτά. The removal of the colon makes this assumption unnecessary, and in my opinion clears up the whole passage. It follows, of course, that I cannot assent to Robert's conception of the character of Silenus as standing on a much loftier plane of morality than the mean-spirited sot in the Cyclops. See also on 199 ff.

153 f. ἀπορρυπαίνεται is more emphatic and therefore better than ὑπορρυπαίνεται (cr. n.). Wilamowitz holds that there is a lacuna after this line, on the ground that the dative ψόφῳ is otherwise intolerably harsh, unless supported by a participle like ἐκπλαγέτων. But this is unduly to limit the sphere of the causal (instrumental) dative, which is not infrequently applied to the influence of external circumstances in the place of διὰ c. acc. See El. 549, Trach. 1127, Ant. 691 with Jebb's un. Eur. Hel. 79 n., Helid. 474 n. Andr. 157 στυγούμαι δ' ἀνδρὶ φαρμάκοισι σοῖς. ib. 247 μισῶν γε πατρίδα σὴν Ἀχλλέως φόνῳ. El. 149 χέρα δὲ κρᾶτ' ἐπὶ κούρῳ | τιθεμένα θανάτῳ σῶ. I dwell upon this the more, because the examples given by Kuehner-Gerth 1 439 are not representative of this aspect of the idiom.—κόλακι is obscure, and, if Hunt is right in rendering it 'cheating,' one does not see whom shepherds are supposed to delude. I suggest that there is a contemptuous allusion to the soothing of the shepherd's pipe: Eur. fr. 773, 27 σύριγγας δ' οὐριβάται | κινούσιν ποιμένας, ἐλάται. Alc. 577 βοσκήμασι σοῖσι συρίζων | ποιμήντας ὕμναίους. Rhes.

551 ἥδη δὲ νέμονται κατ' Ἴδαν. | ποιμνία· νυκτιβρόμου σύριγγος ἰάν κατακούω. Soph. Phil. 213 οὐ μολπὰν σύριγγος ἔχω, ὡς ποιμὴν ἀγροβάτας. Eur. Hel. 1483 σύριγγι πειθόμεναι ποιμένος,—transferred to the cranes. What else than the strains of the pipe can be the 'shepherds' noise'? The shepherd pipes to his flock which obeys him: i.e. the sound is intended to soothe the flock. Observe how this description of the sound confirms the interpretation given of 107. Hunt places a comma at the end of 154, and accepts δν from Wilamowitz in 155; but the multiplication of relative clauses is rather to be avoided.

155 The child's fear of the unknown may be illustrated from Plat. Phaed. 77 E ἴσως ἐνι τις καὶ ἐν ἡμῖν παῖς δς τὰ τοιαῦτα φοβείται. To be afraid before you have cause is like crying out before you are hurt (Phil. 917, Ar. Plut. 477).

156 χρυσόφαντον is a new compound. Cf. 45.

157 ἀνδεξάτο is a formal word for to undertake, acknowledge, become responsible for. Cf. Isae. 3, 18. Dem. 33. 22, 35. 7, 46. 7, 59. 58.

159 εὐδετε: ye are idle. The application to persons in the metaphorical sense is Sophoclean: O. T. 65 ὦστ' οὐχ ὕπνῳ γ' εὐδοντά μ' ἐξεγείρετε. O. C. 307 κελ βραδὺς | εὐδει.

160 ἀναοστήσαντες, not to pursue (Hunt) but to return to the path. It should be remembered that the simple verb does not primarily or chiefly mean to return.—For the minatory condition see Goodwin, § 447.

κλαίοντες αὐτῇ δειλία ψοφή[σ]ετε.

- 5 ΧΟ. πάτερ, παρὼν αὐτός με συμποδηγέτε[ι], ἢ' εὖ κατειδῆς εἴ τίς ἐστι δειλία.
 γνώση γὰρ αὐτὸς ἂν παρῆς οὐδὲν λέγω[ν]. 165

ΣΙ. ἐγὼ πα[ρ]ὼν αὐτός σε προσβιβῶ λόγῳ κυνορτικὸν σύριγμα διακαλούμε[ος].

- 10 ἀλλ' εἴ' [ἀ]φίστω τριζύγης οἴμου βάσιν,

165 λόγων, ut videtur, pap.²
 Hunt | οἴμου pap.

168 ιει in εἴ' corr. pap. | ἀφίστω scripsi: ἐφίστω

162 Hunt's rendering 'you shall make a noise in lamentation for your very cowardice' is not quite clear. Rather: 'your very cowardice shall end in noisy whimpering.' αὐτῇ: i.e. so far from escaping from pain by your cowardice, it will be the cause of your chastisement. Wecklein's αὐτοί is unnecessary. I suppose ψοφήσετε to have been deliberately chosen instead of βοήσεσθε in reference to the disturbing ψόφος of 154, just as conversely βοῶν is sometimes ironically applied to inanimate objects (e.g. Ar. Ran. 859). It is difficult to say whether the dative is rather causal or circumstantial, but the character of the noun distinguishes this example from the familiar type of fr. 958. Maas, however, thinks that ψοφήσετε is a vulgarism for ἀπολείσθε, on the ground that it is used with that sense in Byzantine and modern Greek. Wilamowitz calls attention to the similar development of διαφω-νεῖν (Agatharchides ap. Phot. bibl. 457, 25).

163 συμποδηγέτε: this is a new word beside συμποδηγεῖν, corresponding to ποδηγετεῖν: ποδηγεῖν. Cf. κυνηγετεῖν: κυνηγεῖν.

165 αὐτός appears to belong to παρῆς, as well as to παρὼν in 163 and 166. In each case it bears a considerable emphasis: 'Father, do come yourself...' and so forth.

166 προσβιβῶ λόγῳ, not 'I will urge you on by my voice' (Hunt) but 'I will win you over by argument.' The phrase is used ironically of a persuasion that will not derive its force from logical superiority. Cf. Ar. Av. 425 προσβιβῶ λόγῳ. Eq. 35 εὖ προσβιβάζεις μ'. Aeschin. 3. 93 τῷ λόγῳ προσβιβάζων ἡμᾶς... ὥς κτέ.

167 κυνορτικὸν σύριγμα may be illustrated from the note on fr. 9 ἐπισίγματα. —διακαλούμενος: the encouragement will be given in various (δια-) quarters.

168 ἐφίστω was adopted by Hunt and Wilamowitz, and compared with Trach. 339 τοῦ με τῆνδ' ἐφίσταται βάσιν, which would then be interpreted 'why dost thou approach me thus?' The present passage is rendered 'take your stand at the cross-ways'; and, since the relevance of the remark to the situation is not apparent, Wilamowitz constructs an elaborate mise en scène in justification of the text. Three paths are represented on the stage, converging at the cave of Cyllene, and possibly rising towards it. The chorus in the orchestra divide themselves into three bodies, each of which follows one of the paths indicated. He points out that the wooden stage-buildings provided for each performance allowed considerable freedom to the poet for the arrangement of his stage. In conformity with the supposed conditions, he divides the chorus into three rather than two sections in the passage beginning at v. 94. This is ingenious rather than convincing, and τριζύγης οἴμου is too slender a foundation to support the superstructure. I have proposed to restore ἀφίστω, which yields a simple and appropriate meaning. To stand at the cross-roads, i.e. at a point where the road bifurcates (as explained by Gildersleeve on Pind. Pyth. 11. 38 κατ' ἀμυνσι-πόρους τραδούς ἐδινήθηρ, | ὁρῶν κέλευθον ἰὼν τὸ πρὶν), was a proverbial image typical of hesitation: Theogn. 911 ἐν τριδῶ δ' ἔστηκα· δὲ εἰσι τὸ πρόσθεν ὁδοὶ μοι· | φρον-τίζω τούτων ἥτιν' ἔω προτέρην. Oppian Halieut. 3. 501 εἰκελὸς ἀνδρὶ | ξείνῳ, ὅς ἐν τριδῶσι πολυτρίπτουσι κυρήσας | ἔστη ἐφορμαίνων κραδίη τε οἱ ἄλλοτε λαίηρ, | ἄλλοτε δεξιτέρην ἐπιβάλλεται ἀτραπὸν ἐλθεῖν· | παπταίνει δ' ἐκάτερθε, νδὸς δέ οἱ ἥτοε κύμα | εἰλεῖται, μάλα δ' ὀψέ μῆς ὠρέξατο βουλῆς. Hesych. π p. 110. Zenob. 3. 78. Suid. s.v. ἐν τριδῶ εἰμι λογισμῶν. παροιμία. ἐπὶ τῶν ἀδύλων καὶ ἐγὼ δ' ἐν [ἐ]ργοῖς παρμένων σ' ἀπενθύνω.

 XO. ὦ ὦ ὦ, ψ ψ, ἀ ἀ. λέγ' ὅ τι πονεῖς. 170
 τί μάτην ὑπέκλαγες ὑπέκριγες
 ὑπό μ' ἴδες; ἔχεται 15 ἐν πρώτῳ τίς ὁδε τρόπ[ω];
 ἔχει· ἐλήλυθεν, ἐλήλ[υ]θεν.
 ἐμὸς εἰ, ἀνάγον. 175
 δευτ', ὦ, τίς ὁδε . [. . .] . της
 ὁ δράκεις, ὁ γράπεις [. . . .]

172 ὑπό μ' ἴδες ex ὑπ' ἐμέ ἴδες corr. pap.² 173 ἐν ex ἐ corr. pap.² 174 ἐλελυθεν (bis) pap.: corr. pap.² 176 δευτε in marg. pap.²: δευτερω pap.

ἀμφιβόλων πραγμάτων. It is evident, then, that 'to leave the cross-road' is the same as 'to go straight on,' or, in other words, 'to hesitate no longer'; and it will be observed how well that agrees with the appearance of ἀπενθύνω in the following line. Here of course we have nothing but a figure of speech directed against the trembling satyr: there was no cross-road on the stage.—It may be assumed that ἀφίστω is intransitive in accordance with its usage, and that βάσιν is parallel to Ar. 42 τήνδ' ἐπεμπίπτει βάσιν, and less closely to Eur. Heliad. 802 ἐκβάς πόδα (n.).—For the compound adjective with three terminations see on fr. 394.—For the aspiration of ἄμου Wilamowitz quotes Herodian I 546 Lentz τὸ ὄμιος, οἰμὴ δασύνεται: cf. φροῖμον.

170 π. The chorus bustle to and fro in a series of spasmodic attempts to follow up the trail. Apparently they fall foul of each other in their clumsy and blundering movements; and there was an opportunity for a certain amount of pantomimic buffoonery. The ode should no doubt be divided between different speakers, but is too much mutilated to justify an attempt to distribute the constituent elements. There is a high degree of probability in Robert's view (p. 547) that the lyrics are a Commos between Silenus and the chorus, and that the greater part of them came from the lips of Silenus. Thus the various commands and appeals agree with his promise in 166 f., and the question of the chorus in 197 is unnatural, if supposed to refer so far back as 30 lines.—The metre comprises resolved anapaests (proceleusmatics: Ar. Av. 327, Lys. 480, Pratinas fr. 1) combined with cretics. 173 is probably a glyconic. ὦ ὦ ὦ: see on 125. ψ without a vowel sound recalls the Plautine st. It is not recorded elsewhere, but is apparently a drover's cry like ψό fr. 521. Wilamowitz rejects the arrangement ὕνψ ψαᾶ, forms which are equally devoid of authority.

171 f. 'Why dost idly groan and gibber and look askance at me?' ὑποκρίτω is used by Aelian nat. an. 6. 19 of the noise made by the locust. κρίζω, to squeak or creak, is used also of the sound of foreign speech (Ar. Av. 1520) and of the chirping of a bird (Hom. B 314). ὑποκλάψω does not occur elsewhere.

173 ἐν πρώτῳ...τρόπῳ: does this mean 'in the first lap (turn)'? So τρόπος = 'direction' in Herod., e.g. 1. 189 διώρυχας ὀγδώκοντα καὶ ἑκατὸν...τετραμμένα πάντα τρόπον. Robert however reads τρόπος, referring to 120.

174 ἔχει: you are caught.

175 ἀνάγον: 'off with you!' i.e. consider yourself a prisoner. ἀνάγειν, technically to arrest, is illustrated by Holden on Plut. Them. 23.

176 Robert restores δευτέρῳ τίς ὁδε τρόπος; ἴτης κτέ., and is probably right in supposing that at this point Silenus addresses individual satyrs by name: ἴτης ὁ δράκεις, ὁ γράπεις, Ούπλος, Μέθυρος (or Μεθύων), Στράτιος, Κροκίας (cf. κηκίας), and lastly Τρέχης, which is to be compared with Δρόμος on the Brygos vase and Πόδις (Heydemann, Satyr- u. Bakchen-namen, pp. 36, 38).

177 δράκεις is an unknown word, but its correctness is rendered probable by the presence of γράπεις. Wilamowitz adduces Δράκεις, which is the name of a satyr on more than one inscription (Fauly-Wissowa v 1568). For γράπεις

- 20 [ο]ὐρίας οὐρίας ἀδ[.]κεις παρέβης· μεθν[.]
ὅτι ποτε φερε[.]· ι[.]ν 180
ἔποχον ἔχει τι[.]
στίβος ὁδενεσ[.]
- 25 στράτιος στράτ[ιος]ν[. . .]
δεῦρ' ἔπον· τ[.]δρ[.]
- Col. viii ἐνι β[ο]ῦς ἐνι πόνο[.] 185
μὴ μεθῇ κρ[ο]κία[ς]
σὺ τί καλ[ὸ]ν ἐπιδ[.]
ὁδε γ' ἀγαθὸς ὁ τρέ[χ]ις
5 κατὰ νόμον ἔπετα[ι] ἐφέπον ἐφέπον μ[.] 190
ὀπποποῖ· ἃ μιανέ, γε[.]
ἦ τάχ' ὀπόταν ἀπίη[ς] ἀπελευθέρος ὦν ὅλ[.]
10 ἀλλὰ μὴ παραπλακ[.]
ἔπ[ι]θ' [ἔ]πεχ' εἰσιθ' ἴθι [.] 195
τ[ὸ] δὲ πλάγιον ἔχομ[εν]
π[ά]τερ, τί σ[ι]γάς; μὲν ἀληθ[ὲς] εἶπομεν;
οὐκ εἰσακο[ύ]εις, ἦ κεκώ[φη]σαι, ψόφον;
15 ΣΙ. σί[γα].

180 νόμος νόμον Theonem legisse testatur pap.²

186 με ex δε corr. pap.²

192 ἦ: η supra ei scr. pap.²

193 ολβ legi posse negat Hunt

197 β in marg. ducentesimo versui adscriptum

see Hesych. I p. 445 γράβω· γήρας τέττιγος, ἢ ὄψεως, καὶ τῶν ἐκδυομένων. καὶ εἶδος ὀρέου. καὶ ῥυσσόν, ἀπὸ τοῦ γραμμᾶς ἔχειν τὰς ῥυτίδας, ὅθεν καὶ ἡ γραῖς ἦν· μολόγηται. Here one suspects the meaning wrinkled, which is attested also by Etyim. M. p. 239, 31 γράβω· ὁ ἐρρυτιδωμένος. Similar are Aristoph.'s στρόφις (Nub. 450), γάστρις (An. 1604).

179 μεθύεις, ἀπορεῖς, Rossbach. But see on 176.

182 στίβος ὁδε νέος, Rossbach.

192 The meaning is perhaps again discernible: 'I expect you will soon regain your freedom...', spoken with irony. However, ἦ τάχα is not ironical in Hom. σ 73, 338, 399, but expresses a solemn warning or foreboding.

194 We should expect παραπλαγῆς ἢ or παράπλαγκτος ἴσθι (γέννη) rather than παράπλακτος. But πλαγκτός itself is sometimes written πλακτός in our MSS: see Aesch. Pers. 280, Ag. 598.

197 μὲν is used ironically: 'can it be that we spoke the truth after all?' For examples see Kuehner-Gerth II 525.

198 ψόφον was restored by Wilamowitz. The hyperbaton is not uncommon in tragedy: cf. Eur. Cycl. 121 σπείρουσι δ', ἢ τῷ ζῶσι, Δήμητρος στάχυν; Rhes. 565 Διόμηδες, οὐκ ἤκουσας, ἢ κενὸς ψόφος | στάζει δι' ὧτων, τευχέων τινὰ κτύπον; Hel. 719 n. Hclid. 132 n. Soph. fr. 764. Kaibel on El. 1358.

199 π. The proper arrangement of these lines has been the subject of some discussion. The speeches are divided by paragraphi in the papyrus, exactly as they are printed in the text, except that

XO. τί ἔστιν;

ΣΙ. οὐ μὲνῶ.

XO. μέν', εἰ θέλεις.

ΣΙ. οὐκ ἔστιν, ἀλλ' αὐτὸς σὺ ταύθ' [ὅπῃ θέλεις 200

199 τί ἔστιν; etiam Sileno, οὐ μὲνῶ choro, μέν' εἰ δύνῃ (quod ex v. 200 eiectio θέλεις huc transtulit Wilamowitz) Sileno tribuit Hunt 200 sqq. choro tribuit Hunt | ὅπῃ δύνῃ scriptum fuisse, sed βέλτιον esse ὅπῃ θέλεις in marg. testatur pap.²

a paragraphus appears after 210, which is unnecessary and unusual if the speech which follows is to be attributed to the coryphaeus. Hunt, however, considering it obvious that 200—203 belong to the chorus, and 204—206 to Silenus, corrects the division of 199 by combining τί ἔστιν with σίγα as a remark of Silenus, and continuing accordingly. Being also of opinion that μέν', εἰ θέλεις is unsuitable as addressed by Silenus to the chorus, and that the repetition of θέλεις is awkward if ὅπῃ θέλεις is adopted in 200—though the latter contention can hardly be admitted—he accepts Wilamowitz's proposal to transfer δύνῃ from 200 to 199, and attributes μέν' εἰ δύνῃ to Silenus. By giving 211—214 to Silenus, he allows to the paragraphus after 210 its usual significance. If that view is correct, the upshot of the dialogue will be that the chorus are again alarmed by hearing the sound, and propose to withdraw from the search altogether in favour of their father, but that, after three lines spoken by Silenus, they forthwith resume their labours. I cannot help thinking that, if such was the purpose of Sophocles, his dramatic instinct was temporarily in abeyance. As against Wilamowitz, however, Hunt attributes 252 ff. as well as the subsequent dialogue with Cyllene to the chorus and not to Silenus; and he is consequently driven to suppose that Silenus runs off in alarm directly Cyllene appears. See further in this connexion on 357.

It appears to me, however, not only that the MS arrangement of 199 is susceptible of defence, but that by distributing the following speeches in accordance with its requirements we obtain a comic effect which is exactly in keeping with the character of Silenus, and avoid the necessity of accounting for his subsequent disappearance. The difficulty of the paragraphus after 210 I cannot regard as serious. We do not know enough to feel sure that it might not have been intended to divide the lyrics from the

senarii; and in any case errors in its employment are frequent (cf. 68). We suppose, then, that Silenus hears the noise clearly for the first time at v. 198, and is so terrified that he resolves to depart at once and does so, although the chorus apparently attempt to keep him. On that assumption, the ironical tone of μέν' εἰ θέλεις, 'do please stay,' or 'won't you stay?' is exactly suitable to the occasion, if the chorus are now aware that Silenus is rather more frightened than the rest of them. Cf. Phil. 730 ἔρπ', εἰ θέλεις ('I pray thee, come on'), and El. 585 εἰ γὰρ θέλεις, δίδασκον (where the tone is ironical, as here: see Jebb's n.). In 200, so far as the sense is concerned, it is indifferent whether we read ὅπῃ θέλεις or ὅπῃ δύνῃ (see cr. n.), but the former is to be preferred for the reason that δύνῃσθαι is a very common gloss on θέλεις in conditions similar to the present. See schol. M Aesch. Pers. 177 θέλῃ: ἀντὶ τοῦ δύνῃσθαι. Schol. Ar. Av. 581 οὐκ ἐθέλησεν: ἀντὶ τοῦ οὐ δυνήσεται. Schol. A Hom. Φ 366 ἐθέλει ἡδύνατο. Schol. Hom. A 353, γ 121. Apollon. lex. Hom. p. 86, 13. Greg. Cor. p. 135 Sch. Hesych. II pp. 21, 305. Suid. s.v. ἐθέλησεν, θέλει, οὐ θέλησεν. Phot. lex. p. 82, 17. The grotesque cowardice of Silenus after his vapourings in 147 ff. may be illustrated by his similar behaviour in the Cyclops (228 ff.), as well as by the general description of the satyrs in Nonnus (14. 121): ἐν δὲ κυδοιμοῖς | πάντες ἀπειλητῆρες δαί φεύγοντες Ἐνυώ, | νόσφι μύθοιο λείοντες ἐνὶ πολέμοις δὲ λαγυῶ. I have accordingly proposed to complete 202 ff. by reading ὡς μοι δοκεῖ | μὴ πλείστον ἔτι μένοντα διατρίβειν χρόνον, which is consistent with the indications of the papyrus. Robert's view of the character of Silenus as 'him-melweit verschieden' from the portrait given by Euripides has already been mentioned in the n. on 152. He goes so far as to claim that the speech beginning at 139 is worthy of Ajax or any other tragic hero.

ζήτει τε καὶ ξίχνευε καὶ πλούττει λαβὼν τὰς βοῦς τε κα[ι] τὸν χρυσὸν [.]ε[.]
 μὴ πλείστ[.] . . . τι . . . ν[.] χρόνον.
 20 ΧΟ. ἀλλ' οὐ τι μ[.] . . . μ[.]
 οὐδ' ἐξυπελ[θεῖ]ν τ[.] φῶς 205 εἰδῶμεν οὐ[.]
 ἰὼ γ[.]
 φθέγγ' ἀφύσ[ε]ις[.] ου
 25 [.]ηδ[.] μισ-
 Col. ix θό[ν] δ[.]όμοισιν ὀλβίσης. 210
 ὁ[δ'] ο[ὐ] φαν[εῖ]ται τοῖσιν· ἀλλ' ἐγὼ τάχα φ[έ]ρων κτύ[π]ον πέδορτον ἐξαναγκάσω
 π[η]δῆμασιν κραιπνοῖσι καὶ λακτίσμασιν
 5 ὦ[σ]τ' εἰσακοῦσαι κεί λῖαν κωφός τις εἶ.

204 sqq. Sileno tribuit Hunt

208 φθεγγμα ἀφύσ[ε]ις in marg. add. pap.²

211 ὁ δ' Hunt qui hunc et sequentes versus Sileno tribuit 214 εἰ pap.: ἦ Hunt

204 is restored by Hunt ἀλλ' οὐ τι μὴ σοί μ' ἐκλιπεῖν ἐφήσομαι. For οὐ τι μὴ cf. O. C. 450 ἀλλ' οὐ τι μὴ λάχῃσι τοῦδε συμμάχου.

205 ἐξυπελθεῖν is a hitherto unknown compound, but see on fr. 524. The following words are restored thus by Hunt (partly after Murray): τοῦ πόνου πρὶν γ' ἂν σαφῶς | εἰδῶμεν ὅτιν' ἔνδον ἦδ' ἔχει στέγη.

208 ff. φθέγγ' ἀφύσ[ε]ις is restored by Hunt from the margin, since the text is mutilated. He gives reasons against accepting ἀ φύσ[ε]ις (Wilamowitz) and suggests that ἀφύσ[ε]ις may have been the reading in the text. No parallel is quoted for the phrase φθέγγ' ἀφύσ[ε]ις, but it may be illustrated by γλώσσαν ἐκχέας in fr. 929 (n.): the papyrus gives φθέγγ[μα] here, as well as in 254, 278, 292, and 320, and that form was approved by Herodian (Crönert, Mem. Gr. Herculi. p. 69).—μισθὸν ὀλβίσης, if joined as 'produce rich pay,' would be parallel to τυφλοῦν ἔλκος (Ant. 973) and the rest.

211 88'...ἀλλ': 'he won't show himself for that: well, then...' Hunt, who prefers ὁ δ', makes Silenus the speaker, and treats τοῖσιν as masculine. But, in holding that τοῖσιν cannot be instrumental (causal), he undoubtedly goes too far: see the passages quoted on 154 and esp. Antiph. 5. 3 ἀπιστοὶ γενόμενοι τοῖς ἀληθέσιν αὐτοῖς τοῖσις ἀπώλοντο.

212 φέρον, bringing into play, applying to the case. Cf. Eur. Tro. 333 ἔλισσε τῶδ' ἐκείσε μετ' ἐμθεν ποδῶν | φέρουσα φιλτάταν βάσιν.—πίδορτον is a new word, but appears to be a suitable epithet for the sound produced by feet striking against the ground. Robert however prefers Leo's φῶρων (for φέρον): i.e. tracking out the sound rising from the ground. But it is surely unnatural to dissociate κτύπον from εἰσακοῦσαι.

213 πηδήμασιν. Cf. Vergil's saliantes Satyros (Ecl. 5. 73). Cornut. 30. p. 59 οἱ Σκιρτοὶ ἀπὸ τοῦ σκαίρειν. Robert seems to be right in rejecting Leo's view, based on Ter. Eun. 285 and other passages, that λακτίσμασιν refers to kicks delivered against the door.

214 ὦστ' is actually redundant after ἐξαναγκάσω, but is often so employed in order to emphasize the result (Eur. Hel. 1040 n., Jebb on Soph. O. C. 270).—Hunt substitutes ἦ for εἰ on the ground that the third person is required. But it would not be unnatural that after τοῖσιν in 211 the speaker should turn to address directly the unseen occupant of the cave. For similarly abrupt transitions cf. O. T. 1198, Bacchyl. 9. 13. Robert also questions the necessity for Hunt's alteration, but thinks that the text is a conflation of two readings, one of which was ὦστ' εἰσακοῦσθ'...εἶ.

ΚΤΑΛΛΗΝΗ

θῆρες, τί [τό]νδε χλοερὸν ὑλώδη πάγον 215
 ἐν[θ]ηρον ὠρμήθητε σὺν πολλῇ βοῇ;
 τίς ἦδε τέχνη, τίς μετὰστασις πόνων
 οὓς πρόσθεν εἶχες δεσπότη χάριν φέρων,

215 χωρον legisse Aristophanem testatur pap.²
 pap.² 218 εἶχες Wilamowitz: εἶπες pap.

217 μετὰστασις ex μετασις corr.

215 For the description of the scenery see Introductory Note.—Hunt's suggestion that the reading of Aristophanes (cr. n.) was not χωρον but χλωρόν is almost certainly correct.

216 σὺν. βοῇ. For the preposition cf. El. 641 μή σὺν φθόνῳ τε καὶ πολυγλώσσῳ βοῇ (which also illustrates the double application of σὺν in 222), ib. 1283.

217 μετὰστασις πόνων, change from labours: see on fr. 374. For πόνων applied to the rites of Dionysus Robert (p. 552) well quotes Eur. Bacch. 66 πόνον ἡδὺν κάματον τ' εὐκάματον, but his further contention that πόνων was a technical expression for the song and dance of the tragic chorus is not established by the evidence which he cites.

218 π. This is the most puzzling passage in the text so far as it has been recovered, chiefly owing to the difficulty of identifying the master whose proceedings are here described. The general question has been discussed in the Introductory Note, but certain points of detail which arise here still require notice. (1) Hunt suggested (p. 79) that Silenus might be the δεσπότης; and, partly no doubt for this reason, was induced to accept παίδων from Wilamowitz in 222. Apart from other difficulties, a conclusive objection is that Silenus himself, as well as his children, was in servitude to some master (57, 69). (2) The theory of Wilamowitz, who holds that the master's identity was revealed in the latter part of the play, has been already discussed. It should be added that Wilamowitz does not explain how his emendation of 222 can be reconciled with his refusal to put forward any conjecture on the main question. (3) Robert thinks that the service of Dionysus is meant. This is no doubt the first idea that suggests itself; but it cannot be made to harmonize with the text as it stands, and Robert is forced to conclude that a line has been lost after 220, containing the verb required for Dionysus (e.g. ἡγάτο) and the subject of εὐάξετο (i.e. Silenus). (4) It has already been suggested that the δεσπότης must have been Apollo, since the satyrs expected to receive their release at his hands; and it has been shown that there is nothing surprising in the introduction of Apollo into the Bacchic thiasus. What is then to be made of σὺν ἐγγόνῳι νόμφαισι? In answer it may be remarked that Apollo is often associated with the Nymphs, and that he bore the special title of Νυμφηγέτης at Thasos and at Samos (Wernicke in Pauly-Wissowa II 61). That title, however, must be intimately related to, if it is not merely a substitute for, the better-known Μουσηγέτης (Pausan. I. 2. 5, Pind. fr. 116). Further, since there is respectable authority (Eumel. fr. 17 K.) for the statement that Apollo was the father of the Muses, it is not extravagant to suppose that he might also have been described—particularly in a passage to which his function as Νυμφηγέτης is entirely relevant—as father of the Nymphs. [In C. R. XXVI 310 I enumerated the difficulties involved in these lines, and threw out certain suggestions for their removal. But Wilamowitz (Sappho u. Simonides, p. 922) has shown that ἐν-γονος does not exist, and that ἐγγονος is always ἐκ-γονος. Besides, except as a last resource, we are not justified in disturbing the text.]

εἶχες: see cr. n. eἶχες yields no intelligible meaning, and Wilamowitz's correction seems inevitable [eides in ed. min. is an error].—νέβριση, a new word, corresponding to φῆγμος, λάγμος, and many others, where the suffix denotes material. See Brugmann, Comp. Gr. II p. 156 E. tr.—καθημύμενος: the νέβρις was fastened at one shoulder and slung across the body so that the folds were below the other. Hence καθάπτω rather than ἐνδύω: for that the former does not mean 'to dress' or 'clothe' may be seen by consulting the examples which L. and S. quote for

- 10 ὑμῖν ὅς αἰεὶ νεβρίνη καθημμέν[ο]ς δораῖ χερ[ο]ῖν τε θύρσ[ο]ν εὐπαλῇ φέρων 220 ὀπισθεν εὐιάζει' ἀμφὶ τὸν θεὸν σὺν ἐγγόνοις νύμφαισι καὶ ποδῶν ὄχλῳ;
 νῦν δ' ἄγνοω τὸ χρῆμα· ποῖ στροφαι νέ[ω]ν 15 μανιῶν στρέφουσι; θαῦμα γὰρ κατέκλ[υ]ον, ὁμοῦ πρόπον κέλευμά πως κ[υ]νηγετ[ῶ]ν 225
 ἐγγὺς μολόντων θηρὸς εὐναί[ου] τρο[φ]ῆς, ὁμοῦ δ' ἂν αὐτί[ς] . . . αἰ φωρ[. . .] . . .

219 υμειν pap.

221 εὐιάζει' pap.: εὐιάζειs pap.² | ζή(ται) in marg. add. pap.²

222 παίδων Wilamowitz

223 νέων conl. Hunt, quia νέων spatium vix continet

224 post γάρ interpunxit Hunt | κατήλυθεν legisse Theonem testatur pap.²

that sense. Cf. Eur. fr. 752 θύρσοις καὶ νεβρίων δораῖς καθαρπός. Nonn. II. 233 ὑψόθεν ὤμου | νεβρίδα καὶ ψυχροῖσιν ἐπὶ στέροισι καθάψας. Lucian Bacch. 1 γυναῖκες... νεβρίδας ἐνημμένοι, Strabo 719 (quoted by Hunt) καθημμένους νεβρίδας ἢ δορκάδων δораῖς, Eur. Bacch. 24 νεβρίδ' ἐξάψας χροός.—εὐπαλῇ, habilem. A chief characteristic of the thyrsus was its slenderness: ἀνὰ θύρσον τε τινάσσων Eur. Bacch. 80. Cf. Lucian l.c. δораτὰ τινα μικρὰ ἔχουσαι. Ov. Met. 6. 593 uivero levis incubat hasta. Stat. Theb. 2. 664 nebridat et fragilis thyrsos portare.—εὐιάζει' appears to be a Sophoclean middle, for which see on fr. 941, 16. See cr. n., from which it appears that some critic thought that the verb was or ought to be in the second person, and substituted the singular εὐιάζειs as more appropriate. The presence of ὑμῖν may have caused him to add ζήτ.—ποδῶν ὄχλῳ, dancing rout (concourse of feet). Cf. Eur. fr. 322 φιλημάτων ὄχλῳ. The phrase appears to me quite suitable to a description of the thiasos: cf. Eur. Bacch. 165 ἡδομένα δ' ἄρα... κῶλον ἄγει ταχύπουν σκιρτήμασι Βάκχα. Robert thinks ποδῶν impossible, and is inclined to acquiesce in παίδων, though he would prefer καὶ θηρῶν ὄχλῳ or Μανιάδων ὄχλῳ.

223 f. I have altered the punctuation: Hunt prints a comma after χρῆμα, with colons following στρέφουσι and γάρ. He remarks that there is scarcely enough room for νέων, but no other supplement seems to be possible.—στρέφουσι, of mental agitation, as in Plat. rep. 330 D (the stories about Hades) στρέφουσιν αὐτοῦ τὴν ψυχὴν μὴ ἀληθεῖς ὥν.—κατέκλυνον: see cr. n. Against κατήλυθεν it may be urged that ἤλυθον is not used elsewhere by Sophocles in dialogue, and that the meaning of the compound is far from clear. But I fail to understand why Hunt's punctuation (cr. n.) should be considered essential to the adoption of κατέκλυνον.

225 πρόπον, of sound clearly heard. Cf. Aesch. Ag. 333 οἶμαι βοῇν ἀμεικτον ἐν πόλει πρόπειν. There is a similar transference from sight to sound in 322 f. and in O. T. 186 παῖδαν δὲ λάμπει.

226 θηρὸς εὐναίου τροφῆς: the brood of a beast in its lair. For εὐναίος cf. fr. 174, and for the concrete sense of τροφῆς O. T. 1 ὦ τέκνα, Κάδμου τοῦ πάλας νέα τροφή. Eur. Cycl. 189 μηκάδων ἀρνῶν τροφαί. Wilamowitz, however, reading εὐναίας, thinks that den, or lair, is the meaning required and conjectures στροφῆς (coll. ἐπιστροφαι, ἀναστροφαι).

227 f. are not easy to restore. The sentence appears to be constructed similarly to Rhes. 875 οὐ γὰρ ἐς σὲ τίεται | γλώσσ', ὥς σὺ κομπεῖς. Hence I was inclined to read αἰτία φωρῶν κάτω | γλώσσῃς ἐρείνον' ἐς κλοπὴν πηγυμέναι (or τετραμμέναι), but αἰτία is impossible and ἐρείνον[τ'] ἐς is barely consistent with the traces. Hunt thought that the letter before αἰ was κ (i.e. καί), but could not find a suitable word to precede it which might be the subject of ἐρείνει'. He also believed that εἶναι was the remnant of a perfect infinitive; but it would be difficult to accommodate one to the context. ἂν appears to be iterative. αὐτίς, which the recurrence in 229 makes almost certain (ἀν' ἀλλήν, Murray), is proved to be Attic by the new Menander (Epitr. 362, Sam. 281, 292). See Wila-

- 20 γλώσσης ἐτείνε[. εἰς κλοπὴν [.] . ἐναί αὐτὶς δ' α[.]τ[.] . . μένων [.]α κηρυκ[.]ι[.] . κηρυγμα[.] 230
 καὶ τ[α]ὐτ' ἀφείσα σὺν ποδῶν λακ[τίσμασι [κ]ληδὼν ὁμοῦ πάμφυρ[τ] ἐγειν[ία στέγη.]
 [καὶ] ταῦτ' ἂν ἄλλως ἢ κλ[.] μ[.]
 25 [φω]νῶν ἀκούσας ὥδε παραπεπαισμέν[ων
 . . . [.]φ[.]η[.] . . . νων ὑμᾶς νοσεῖν 235
 νο[. . . τί νύμφη]ν ἔτι ποεῖτ' ἀναιτίαν;
 Col. x XO. νύμφα βαθύζωνε π[α]ῦσαι χόλου (στρ.)
 τοῦδ', οὔτε γὰρ νεῖκος ἤκω φέρων δα[ο]ν μάχας οὐδ' ἄξενό[ς] που σέθεν

238 supplevit Diehl | ὁ inseruit pap.²

239 sq. supplevit Murray | νύμφη pap.

mowitz in Sitzungsber. k. Pr. Akad., 1907 p. 872. Hitherto it has been treated as Ionic by the authorities (Weir Smyth, Ionic Dialect, p. 298). L gives αὐτὶς in O. C. 234 and elsewhere, and the editors have perhaps been too hasty in rejecting it. See also fr. 599.

231 The description evidently passes to the conduct initiated at 211.—σύν, restored by Murray where the papyrus is illegible, is considered by Hunt not entirely satisfactory.

232 πάμφυρ, confusedly, is the adverbial acc. commonly found with verbs of motion. See Jebb on Al. 196. Eur. Hel. 455 (n.), Phoen. 311 (n.).

233 The meaning may be 'otherwise than in the actual circumstances' (e.g. ἢ [or εἰ] κλύουσ' ἐμάνθανον).

234 παραπεπαισμένων, mad, foolish (from παραπαίω, which is also used absolutely = delirio). Cf. Lucian hist. conscr. 2 ἑλάντων γὰρ ἂν τοῦτο παρέπαιον. Hesych. III pp. 271, 275 s.v. παραπαίωμα (παραπαίμα), παραπαίωτος.

235 f. Hunt states that φαῖν ἂν is more suitable to the conditions than ἐφην ἂν, and suggests some such context as αἰναῖσι... φρενῶν (δαίμωνων)... νόσοις, adding however that ἂν φρενῶν cannot both be read. In 236 the first five letters after the gap are doubtful, and ἔτι ποεῖτ' is hardly satisfactory. ἐπποεῖτ', which Hunt reluctantly gives up, is said to be inconsistent with the remains.

237 ff. The ode corresponds to 283 ff., as appears from the number of the lines and the equivalence of 244 to 290. The metre, which is quite simple, is iambic

(cretic). The ithyphallic clausula may be illustrated by Ant. 852, 976, El. 1089. The ends of the lines have been admirably restored by Diehl, Murray, Hunt, and Wilamowitz.

νύμφα: see on 65.—βαθύζωνε: the word is now generally distinguished from βαθύκολπος, but its original (Homeric) meaning is uncertain. Helbig, who formerly explained it as 'long-waisted' from ε 231, has since changed his mind and now agrees with Studniczka that the meaning is 'slender, with small waist' (Iwan Mueller, Privatalit. p. 83.) βαθύζωνος does not occur in Eur. or elsewhere in Soph., and in Aesch. the commentators are not agreed whether it is merely an ornamental epithet applicable to any woman, or carries with it an implication of luxury and delicate nurture (see Verrall and Tucker on Theb. 850 and Cho. 168). In Pindar it is applied to Leda, Latona, the Graces, and the Muses (Gildersleeve on Ol. 3. 37), and it is a fair inference that Sophocles used it as a complimentary epithet to signify beautiful proportions and elegant apparel.

238 ἤκω φέρων (cr. n.), as in O. C. 357, 579, Phil. 1267, is better than Murray's ἤκει σέ τοι (cf. for the acc. fr. 94).

239 οὐδ'. If the text is right, οὐδέ is intended to contrast the second clause instead of correlating it. That is to say, it would imply: 'no, nor yet...' Where this is intended, we often have οὐδ' αἶ, οὐδέ γε, etc.: Kuehner-Gerth II 290. See also Bury on Pind. Isthm. 2. 44. In O. C. 1141 Jebb accepted Elmsley's οὐτε,

- γλ[ω]σσ' ἄν μάταιός τ' ἀφ' ἡμῶν θίγοι. 240
 5 μὴ με μὴ προψαλ[άξῃς] κακοῖς, ἀλλ' [εὐ]πετῶς μοι πρ[ό]φανον τὸ πρᾶγ-μ', ἐν [τ]όποις τοῖς[δε] τίς νέρθε γὰς ὧδ' ἀγα-στῶς ἐγάρυσσε θέσπιν αὐδα[ν];
 ΚΤ. ταῦτ' ἔστ' ἐκείνων νῦν [τρόπων] πεπαίτερα, 245
 10 καὶ τοῖσδε θηρῶν ἐκπύ[θοιο] μᾶλλον ἂν ἀλκασμάτ[ω]ν δ[ειλῆς] [τε] πειρατηρίων νύμφης· ἐμοὶ γὰρ οὐκ [ἀρεστόν] ἔστ' ἔριν ὀρθοψάλακτον ἐν [λ]όγο[ισ]ιν [ιστάναι].
 ἀλλ' ἥσυχος πρόφαινε καὶ μ[ή]νυ[ε] μοι 250 15 ὅτου μάλιστα πράγματος χρεῖαν ἔχεις.
 ΧΟ. τόπων ἀνασσα τῶν[δ]ε, Κυλλήνης σθένος, ὅτου μὲν οὐνεκ' ἤλθ[ο]ν ὕστερον φράσω·

241 μὴ pap.²: μηδέ pap.

242 sq. supplievit Wilamowitz

244 in textu

omissum, in marg. superiore add. pap.²

245—249 suppleverunt Murray et Hunt

247 λακασμάτων coni. Wilamowitz and it is not clear that οὐδ' is justified here.—ἀξενος, uncivil, as in Plat. soph. 217 B τὸ δὲ αὐτὸ σοὶ μὴ χαρίζεσθαι...ἀξενόν τι καταφαίνεται μοι καὶ ἄγριον.

240 μάταιος, expressing the presumption of rash folly, as (in another sphere) in Trach. 565 ψαύει ματαῖαι χερσίν. Such recklessness of speech was exhibited by Lycurgus: Ant. 961 ψαύων τὸν θεὸν ἐν κετομῶσι γλώσσαις.

241 προψαλάξῃς: see on fr. 550. Here the meaning is: 'don't assail me too soon with taunts.'

242 εὐπετῶς: readily. So Eur. Cycl. 526 ὅπου τιθῇ τις, ἐνθάδ' ἔστιν εὐπετῆς ('contented').

243 νέρθε γὰς is of course only a guess, although it suits the context very well. If the sound of the lyre was represented as coming from under the ground, it would agree with κάτω δονεῖ (282). Robert thinks that is why the chorus went on all fours (119 ff.): see also on 212.

244 θέσπιν αὐδαῖν sounds like a travesty of Homer's θέσπιν ἀοιδῆν (θ 498), which, by a curious coincidence, is applied by Euripides to the music of the lyre (Med. 425).

245 ff. The restorations of these lines clearly satisfy the sense, even if they do not represent the actual words of the original.

247 ἀλκασμάτων might signify 'violent attacks,' since ἀλκάσειν 'μάχεσθαι' appears in Etyim. M. p. 56, 10; 66, 10. But λακασμάτων (cr. n.), 'howlings,' would be much more to the point. For the gen. (= ἡ ἀλκασμῶν) cf. Ant. 74 ἐπεὶ πλείων χρόνος | δὲ δὲ μ' ἀρέσκειν τοῖς κάτω τῶν ἐνθάδε, O.C. 567 τῆς ἐς ἀθρίων | οὐδὲν πλείον μοι σοῦ μέτεστιν ἡμέρας. Kuehner-Gerth II 308.

249 ὀρθοψάλακτον is interpreted by Hunt as 'shrill-sounding' (as if for ὀρθιο—). The point is obscure owing to the rarity of ψαλάσσω, but it might be suggested that the force of ὀρθός is the same as in fr. 1077. Then the whole compound would mean 'violently roused'; but it must be admitted that this meaning would not suit 321, where see n.

252 This speech is given by Hunt to the coryphaeus (see on 199 ff.), but by Wilamowitz and Robert to Silenus. Reasons have already been given for agreeing with the former view, and I cannot assent to Robert's argument that in that case ἤλθον should have been ἤλθομεν.—σθένος. For the periphrasis, which is also Homeric, cf. Trach. 507 δὲ μὲν ἦν ποταμοῦ σθένος.

254 See cr. n. Theon's variant is clearly inferior, however we interpret the text. Hunt rendered 'tell us of this voice which resounds'; but, if that is

- τὸ φθέγμα δ' ἡμῖν τοῦ[θ'] ὅπερ φωνεῖ φράσον καὶ τίς ποτ' αὐτῷ δι[α]χαράσσεται βροτῶν. 255
- 20 KT. ὑμᾶς μὲν αὐτοὺς χρὴ τὰδ' εἰδέναι σαφῶς
ὥς εἰ φανείτε τὸν λ[ό]γον τὸν ἐξ ἐμοῦ, αὐτοῖσιν ὑμῖν ζ[η]μία πορίζεται.
καὶ γὰρ κέκρυπ[ται] τοῦργον ἐν [θ]ε[ω]ν ἔδραις, ἦραν ὅπως μ[ὴ] πύ[σ]τ[ι]ς ἴξετα[ι] λ[ό]γον. 260
- 25 Ζ[εὺ]ς γ[ὰρ] κρυφ[αίαν] ἐς στέγην Ἀτλαντίδος
[.....] εὐστατο
[.....] ν[.] φίλας
Col. xi [.....] λήθη τῆς βαθυζώνου θεᾶς.
[κατὰ σπέ]ος δὲ παῖδ' ἐφίτυσεν μόνον. 265
[τοῦτον δὲ] χερσὶ ταῖς ἐμαῖς ἐγὼ τρέφω.

254 τοῦτο πῶς φωνεῖ legisse Theonem testatur pap.², τοῦθ' δ περιφωνεῖ H. Richards the meaning, he was well advised in the ed. min. to accept δ περιφωνεῖ, the ingenious correction of H. Richards. The objection to this course is that φράζω is not used by Soph. with an accusative of the direct object in the sense of 'to explain.' It is simpler therefore to regard ὅπερ φωνεῖ as an object-clause: 'tell us what this sound means.' Cf. Phil. 559 φράσον δ' ἄπερ γ' ἔλεξας. O.T. 655 φράξε δὴ τί φῆς.

255 αὐτῷ διαχαράσσεται is rendered by Hunt 'expresses himself therewith.' But that is hard to justify, and I should prefer to suppose that there is an allusion to the sound of the πλῆκτρον as it scrapes across the strings of the lyre. Cf. Plut. de soll. an. 20 p. 974 B ὁ δὲ δράκων τῷ μαράθρῳ τὸν ὀφθαλμὸν ἀμβλυώττοντα λεπτύνων καὶ διαχαράττων. We might render: 'who in the world is setting our teeth on edge with it?' Compare the contemptuous use of catgut-scraper and the like in English; for the humour of the situation was enhanced by the satyrs' lack of musical appreciation. Wilamowitz seems to recognize this by the reference to 'Silen, dem sie (Musik) durch Mark und Bein geht' (p. 451.), but refuses to admit that the παρεπιγραφή (βοῖβδος 107) can be used for the sound of the lyre. Rossbach's conjecture αὐτὸ διαχαρίζεται is mistaken.

257 τὸν ἐξ ἐμοῦ, an emphatic variation for τὸν ἐμὸν, occurs also in Trach. 631 τὸν πόθον τὸν ἐξ ἐμοῦ. Ant. 95 τὴν ἐξ ἐμοῦ δυσβολίαν.

258 ζ[η]μία πορίζεται: 'punishment is in store for you, in case you reveal....' The apodosis to εἰ φανείτε is contained in ζ[η]μία, and πορίζεται is unconditional. Cf. Isocr. 4. 157 ἀρὰς ποιοῦνται, εἰ τις ἐπικηρυκεύεται Πέρσας, quoted by Goodwin § 490.

260 ὅπως μ[ὴ] ἴξετα[ι]. For the future indicative with ὅπως μ[ὴ] in a pure final clause see Goodwin § 324. From Sophocles is quoted Phil. 1068 μ[ὴ] προσλεύσσει... ἡμῶν ὅπως μ[ὴ] τὴν τόχην διαφθέρει. Another instance is El. 954 εἰς σέ δὴ βλέπω, | ὅπως τὸν αὐτόχειρα... μ[ὴ] κατοκνήσεις κτανεῖν, where however Jebb prefers to regard εἰς σέ βλέπω as equivalent to a verb of entreaty, and as followed by an object clause accordingly.

262 π. Hunt supplies τήνδ' ἦκε, κά-ξεπραξεν ἀβουλεύσατο, after Murray. Rossbach preferred στέγην, Ἀτλαντίδος | σεμνῆς ἔρωτος ὡς ἅπας ἐγεύσατο, | ἔκρυψεν αὐτὴν... ἀπῆλθε λήθη κτέ. But Terzaghi is perhaps right in requiring that Maia's name should be mentioned here. One might guess for 263 νύμφης ἰκέσθαι πρὸς χέρας σπεύδων φίλας, | εὐνῆς τε, in which case θεᾶς would refer to Hera, as is suggested by h. Herm. 6—9.

265 μόνον cannot be taken with σπέος in the sense of ερημον, but apparently belongs to παῖδα, —'an only child.' Cf. Eur. Andr. 1083 (Peileus refers to Neoptolemus) παῖς μόνου παιδὸς μόνος.

266 The association of Cyllene with Hermes as his nurse is mentioned also by Philostephanus (schol. Pind. Ol. 6. 129) ἐν τῷ περὶ Κυλλήνης (FHG III 30), and Festus s.v. Cyllenius. Robert (p. 553)

- 5 [μητρὸς γ]ὰρ ἰσχυρὸς ἐν νόσῳ χειμάζεται·
 [κάδεσμ]α καὶ ποτῆτα καὶ κοιμήματα
 [πρὸς σπ]αργάνοις μένουσα λικνῖτιν τροφήν
 [ἐξευθ]ετίζω νύκτα καὶ καθ' ἡμέραν. 270
 [ὁ δ' α]ὔξεται κατ' ἡμῶν οὐκ ἐπεικότα
 [ἄπαι]στος, ὥστε θαῦμα καὶ φόβος μ' ἔχει.
 10 [οὐπω γ]ὰρ ἔκτον ἡμῶν ἐκπεφασμέν[ο]ς
 [τύπου]ς ἐρείδει παιδὸς εἰς ἡβης ἀκμήν,
 [κάξορ]μενίζει κοῦκέτι σχολάζεται 275

268 κάδεσμα Bucherer: κάδεσά Wilamowitz 272 ἀπανστος supplevi: μέγιστος
 Hunt 273 ἡμέρας πεφασμένος in marg. add. pap.² 274 τύπου supplevi: γυίοις Wilamowitz 275 ἐπισχολάζεται Athenaei et Eustathii codd.: correxerat Meineke is probably right in inferring that Sophocles was the ultimate authority for the statement, and that his object was to avoid the necessity of making Maia confess to her intrigue with Zeus.

267 χειμάζεται is often applied to physical pain: Phil. 1459 Ἑρμαῖον ὅρος παρέπεμψεν ἐμοὶ | σπῆνον ἀντίτιπον χειμαζομένῳ. Al. 206 Ἀλῆς θολερῶ | κείται χειμῶνι νοσήσας. The metaphor, though strange to us, was quite familiar to the Greeks, so that χειμῶν, χειμαζεσθαι, etc. became technical in medical circles. For examples see Lobeck, Phryn. p. 387. Epicur. fr. 452 Us. τὴν σάρκα τὸ παρὸν μόνον χειμάζειν.

268 κάδεσμα (cr. n.), as co-ordinate with the other substantives, is preferable to ἐδεσά, which Hunt accepted.

269 λικνῖτιν. The word λικνον comes from h. Herm. 21. 150, etc. Miss J. E. Harrison in J. H. S. xxiii 294 gives reproductions from art of the λικνον used as a cradle, in one of which Hermes is represented sitting up, and looking at the stolen cows. 'The λικνον-cradle is a wickerwork shoe-shaped basket with two handles.'

270 ἐξευθετίζω is a plausible restoration, although the compound is new.—νύκτα καὶ καθ' ἡμέραν, night and day alike. Cf. El. 259 κατ' ἡμῶν καὶ κατ' εὐφρόνην αἶ, and for the absence of the prep. with the first noun ih. 780 ὅτε νυκτὸς... οὐτ' ἐξ ἡμέρας. Eur. Bacch. 1009 ἡμῶν εἰς νύκτα τε.

272 ἀπανστος: I have adopted this supplement in preference to μέγιστος, as being more suitable to ἀξέται.

273 ἔκτον ἡμῶν. This is a deviation, prompted by dramatic conditions, from the version of the hymn (17 f.), according to which Hermes, after inventing the lyre in the morning, stole the cattle on the evening of the day of his birth. For a possible ritual significance see F. M. Cornford, Origin of Attic Comedy, p. 87. The marginal variant (see cr. n.), in Robert's opinion, implies that the alternative reading was ἐννέ' ἡμέρας πεφασμένος, since no other numeral is adaptable to it.—ἐκπεφασμένος, brought forth, as in Hom. T 104 σήμερον ἄνδρα φώωσδε μογοστόκος εἰλείθνια | ἐκφαρεί.

274 See cr. n. The objection to γυίοις is not that it cannot be combined with παιδὸς (which then follows ἡβης), but that the instrumental dative, though grammatically possible, involves an unnatural harshness of expression. I formerly conjectured μέτροις, but now prefer τύπους, which simplifies the construction by providing ἐρείδει with an object. With τύπους παιδὸς, 'his childish mould,' cf. Eur. Hclid. 857 νέων βραχύνων... ἡβητὴν τύπον. Aesch. Suppl. 288 γυναικείους τύπους. Soph. Trach. 12 (according to the MSS) ἀνδρῶν τύπων. So also Aesch. Theb. 475, Eur. Bacch. 1331.

275 f. Athen. 63 F Ἀττικοὶ δ' εἶναι αὐτὸν λέγοντες ὄρμενον τὸν ἀπὸ τῆς κράμβης ἐξηθηκότα. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰχθυεῦται· κάξορμενίζει κοῦκ ἐπισχολάζεται βλάστη' (fr. 294 N.²). The same quotation occurs in Eustath. Il. p. 899, 17, but without the name of the play, and with the variant κάξορμενίζει οὐκ. Meineke corrected ἐπισχολάζεται to ἐπὶ σχολάζεται, and his view is now confirmed by the papyrus. For the remarkable use of the middle see supr. 221.—ἐξορμενίζει. The meaning of the word is made clear by the following evidence. Phryn. praep. soph. p. 67, 16 (Bekk. anecd. p. 38, 17) ἐξορμεν-

- [βλάστη·] τοιόνδε παῖδα θησανρὸς στέγει.
 [κατάσχε]τος [δ' ἔτ'] ἐστὶ τοῦ πατρὸς θέσει.
 15 ἀφ[.....] φ]θέγμα μηχανῇ βρέμ[ον καὶ π[όλ]λ' ἐθά[μβεις, αὐτὸ]ς ἡμέρα μιᾷ ἐξ ὑπτίας κ[.....] ἐμηχ[ανή]σατο. 280 τοιόνδε θη[ρὸς ἐκ θανόντ]ος ἡδονῆς ἔμμεστον ἀ[.....] κ[αὶ] κάτω δ[ονεῖ].
 20 XO. ἄφρασ[το] παῖς βοᾷς (ἀντιστρ.)
 παιδο[.....] μαζισ[ θηρευμ[α]· λέγει[ς 285
 φωνημ[α] σεθου[
 τόνδ' ἀφ[.....] ον[ 25 τως ἐξεφ[.....]
 ροντ' ἄπα[.....] ἐ[κ θανόν-
 Col. xii τος πορίζειν τοιάνδε γάρνυ. 290
 KT. μή νυν ἀπίστε[ι]· πιστὰ γάρ σε προσγελᾷ θεᾷς ἔπη.

276 στέγει ex τέγει corr., etiam τρέφει in marg. add. pap.² 277 κατάσχετος supplevi: δυσέρετος Murray 278 φθεγγμ pap. 283 βοῆς pap. 288 τως pap.
 280 γήρην pap.

ἴξω· τὸ ἐξανθεῖν, ὅπερ οἱ πολλοὶ ἐκβάλλειν
 λέγουσιν. ὅρμενα γὰρ καλεῖται ὑπὸ τῶν Ἀττικῶν τὰ τῶν λαχάνων ἐξανθήματα. οἱ δὲ πολλοὶ καὶ ἀμαθεῖς ταῦτα ἀσπαράγους καλοῦσιν. Hesych. II p. 127 ἐξορμενίζεις· ἐκκεκαυλῆκας, ἐκκέχυσαι. Pollux 6. 54
 πᾶν δὲ τὸ ὑπερεξησθῆναι, ὅπερ ἐκκεκαυλῆκός καλοῦσιν, ὁρμενον ὠνόμαζον· καὶ τὸ ὑπέρωρον τι γενέσθαι, ἐξορμενίσαι. From the last passage it seems that ἐξορμενίζειν might be used for to run to seed, but here we should render simply 'sprouts forth.'
 Nicostr. fr. 34 (II 228 K.) ῥήτορες | ἐξωρμενικότες, δυσχερεῖς, παλιναίρετοι.—θησανρός: i.e. the cavern, as a place securely protected against intrusion. Similarly in Eur. Suppl. 1010 Διὸς θησανρὸν is applied to the bidental of Capaneus (ἄβατον).
 Miss Harrison (Essays to Ridgeway, p.
 140), however, understands that the cave-dwelling was an under-ground storehouse or granary like the σιροί of fr. 276.

277 κατάσχετος has been preferred to δυσέρετος on the ground that a word expressing intentional concealment is required.—θέσει, which does not occur elsewhere in tragedy, is probably rather disposition than command.

278 f. For the palaeographical data see Hunt's n. While decisively rejecting it, he indicates a possibility that the beginnings of the lines 278-289, which are on a separate fragment, should be moved a line lower down. In 278 Hunt's ἀφανεί δ' δ' πύθρη φθέγμα appears to suit the context; for, although φθέγμα ἐμηχανήσατο is an odd phrase, it is justified by 320.

 In 280 ἐμηχανήσατο seems inevitable, but it is difficult to find a suitable supplement;
 for, as Hunt remarks, 'neither κίετης, κάλτης (Murray), nor κόγχης is convincing.' On the other hand, θηρὸς ἐκ θανόντος and δονεῖ, which were proposed by Wilamowitz, are highly probable, and the same critic's ἀγγος εὔρε (or πῆρε?) καὶ is an attractive conjecture.—κάτω: i.e. in the θησανρὸς. Cf. 243 n. For δονεῖν = to make a vibrating sound, see Bury on Pind. Nem. 7. 80.

283 f. Rossbach proposes ἀφραστον ἦν φθέγμα μοι, but that does not fit the following words. The lines are too much mutilated to be capable of restoration.

291 For the metre of this and the following lines see Introductory Note.—
 νυν, long before a vowel: Eur. Hel. 1419η.
 —πιστὰ κτέ. 'For true are the words wherewith a goddess thrills your ear.'— προσγελᾷ implies that the recital has excited the emotions of the chorus. Cf.
 Aesch. Prom. 861 τῶνδε προσσάινει σέ τι; Eur. 253 δαμῇ βροτειῶν αἰμάτων με προσγελᾷ. Soph. Ant. 1214 παῖδός με σαίνει φθόγγος. Eur. Hipp. 862 τύποι γε

ΧΟ. καὶ πῶς πίθωμαι τοῦ θανόντος φθέγμα τοιοῦτον βρέμειν;

ΚΤ. πιθοῦ· θανὼν γὰρ ἔσχε φωνήν, ζῶν δ' ἀναυδος ἦν ὁ θήρ.

5 ΧΟ. ποῖός τις ἦν εἶδος; πρ[ο]μήκης, ἢ ᾤκυρτος, ἢ βραχύς;

ΚΤ. βραχύς χυτρώδης πο[ι]κίλη δορᾷ κατερρικνωμένος.

ΧΟ. ὡς αἰέλουρος εἰκάσαι πέφυκεν ἢ τως πόρδαλις; 296

ΚΤ. πλείστον με[τ]αξύ· γογγύλον γὰρ ἔστι καὶ βρα-χυσκελές.

ΧΟ. οὐδ' ὡς ἰχνευτῇ προσφερὲς πέφυκεν οὐδ' ὡς καρκίνῳ;

10 ΚΤ. οὐδ' αὖ τοιοῦτ[ό]ν ἔστιν, ἀλλ' ἄλλον τιν' ἐξευροῦ τρόπον.

ΧΟ. ἀλλ' ὡς κεράστ[η]ς κάνθαρος δῆτ' ἔστιν Αἰτναῖος φνὴν; 300

ΚΤ. νῦν ἐγγὺς ἐγν[ω]ς ᾧ μάλιστα προσφερὲς τὸ κνώδαλον.

ΧΟ. τ[ί] δ' αὖ τὸ φων[οῦ]ν ἔστιν αὐτοῦ, τοῦντος ἢ τοῦξω, φράσ[ο]ν.

292 γ in marg. trescentesimi versui adscriptum

νη[ύδος?] in marg. add. pap.²

296 χυτρωιδης pap., τροχοιδη[ς] in marg. pap.³

298 ἰχνευμ[ο]ν pap. secundum ed. pr.: corr. Zielinski, ἰχνευτῇ in pap. iam invenit Hunt σφενδόνης χρυσήλατον...προσαίνοισι με.

Rhes. 55 σάινει μ' ἔννευχος φρυκτωρία (of something which demands notice). The fact that the hearer sometimes experiences pleasure is accidental: the essential point is that the signs are presented in a form which compels attention.

292 τοῦ θανόντος φθέγμα: For the retention of the article—'that such a sound can come from the dead'—see on fr. 870.

293 See cr. n. The riddle is taken from h. Herm. 38 ἦν δὲ θάνης, τότε κεν μάλα καλὸν αἰεῖσαι. Cf. Nic. Al. 560 (χελώνην) αὐθῆσαν ἔθηκεν, ἀναδεδῆν περ εἶδαν. Pacuv. Antioch. fr. IV quadrupes tardigrada agrestis humilis aspera, brevis capite, cervice anguina, aspectu truci, eviscerata inanima cum animali sono. For the bearing of the last passage on the question of the date of this play see Introductory Note, p. 230.

294 ἐπικυρτος: arched.

295 χυτρώδης: pot-shaped. Cf. schol. Theocr. 5. 58 γαυλοὶ ἀγγεῖα χυτρωεῖδ' ὑαλινὰ τοῦχα. But it is difficult to say whether this word or τροχιδής was the gloss (see cr. n.).—κατερρικνωμένος: shrivelled. Cf. Callim. fr. 49 ναὶ μὰ τὸ

ρικνὸν | σὺφάρ ἐμὸν. Hunt renders it 'curved,' but see Suid. s.v. κατερρικνωμένον. συνεστραμμένον, κάμπυλον γενόμενον, ἐρρυτιδωμένον, where the last gloss applies to the present passage. Fr. 316 should not be taken to be a reference to this line.

296 αἰέλουρος. The form is established as Sophoclean by fr. 986.—τως here clearly = ὡς. This may also be the case in Aesch. Theb. 624, where the edd. strive to construe it as thus. See also Ar. Ach. 762, where the Megarian is speaking. Stahl however corrects to χῶς.

298 See cr. n. The recovery of the true reading makes it unnecessary to consider Wilamowitz's ἰχνεύμων and κάρκινος, which were adopted in both of Hunt's editions: for the fact that ὡς follows πέφυκεν (ἐστίν...φνὴν) in 296 and 300 shows that here also it is employed in the same way: 'is he not then the very image of an ichneumon?' I now think (with Maas) that ἰχνευτῇ = ἰχνεύμων. Certainly βραχυσκελές suits the ichneumon, and γογγύλον might be explained by Aelian's ἐγκυλίσας αὐτὸν (nat. an. 3. 22).

300 f. This is the climax of absurdity, and is fresh evidence (fr. 162 n.) that

- ΚΤ. [.]λο[. . .]ορίνη σύγγονος τῷ <ν δ>σ-τράκων.
 15 ΧΟ. [ποῖον δὲ τοῦνομ' ἐν]νέ[πει]ς; πόρσυνον, εἴ τι πλ[έ]ον ἔχεις.
 ΚΤ. [τὸν θήρα μὲν χέλυν, τὸ φωνο]ῦν δ' αὖ λύραν ὁ
 π[αῖς κ]αλεῖ. 305
 ΧΟ. [22 litt.] . κτέανον ησυ[. . .] . τινι;
 ΚΤ. [23 ,,] δέρμα κ[. . .]στ. [
 [,, ,,] ον ὠδ[ε] κλαγγά[νει
 20 [,, ,,] ὀρως ἐρείδετα[ι
 [24 ,,] πλεκτα. [310

303 ορεινή (ε postea deleta) pap. | τωστρακρον pap.: συγγονος οστρα[legisse Theonem in marg. testatur pap. 307 κώστρακον coni. Wilamowitz

'Aetnaean beetle' was the ludicrous image of an unfamiliar object. See C.R. XXVIII 224. In regard to κεράστῃς Viljoen answers that horned beetles are actually found in Sicily. That is not surprising, but what we are here concerned with is the horned beetle of the Aetnaean strain. If the horned beetle is so much larger than other species, how much more terrific was the horned Aetnaean beetle which could speak after death.—Cyllene gravely assents: for ἔγγις see on fr. 210, 38.

303 ορίνη. If this is a compound of ῥυός, cf. κελαινόρυς (κελαινόρυς fr. 29 n.), κοσκινόρυς, and for the feminine termination smbr. 168. ορεινή, the original reading, which seems to have been corrected, would of course be a suitable epithet of the tortoise (δρεσκόμοιο χελώνης h. Herm. 42). For ὀστράκων cf. h. Herm. 32 πῶθεν τόδε καλὸν ἄδυμα | αἰδὼν ὀστράκων ἔσσο; Wilamowitz thought that the reading of the papyrus was a fusion of ὀστράκων and ὀστρέων.

306 Mekler pointed out that ἡσυχος and its oblique cases were equally unsuitable to the gap. If η is rightly read it must apparently be the disjunctive ἡ, and we might conjecture πῶς δ' ἂν γένοιτο φίλτερον τὸ κτέανον ἢ σὺργε τινι; In that case, we should have to suppose that the stichomythia ends with this question, which gives occasion for a description by Cyllene of the remarkable qualities of the lyre.

307 δέρμα is no doubt the hide of the oxen: cf. 337 ff., 366. It has been pointed out in the Introductory Note that Apollodorus represents the ox-hide as used for the construction of the strings. Sophocles clearly gave a different account, but the verses of the Homeric hymn (47 ff.), which he probably intended to follow, are unfortunately disputed: πῆξε δ' ἄρ' ἐν μέτροισι ταμῶν δόνακας καλάμοιο, | περὶ ἥνας διὰ νῶτα διὰ ῥινοῖο χελώνης, | ἀμφὶ δὲ δέρμα τάνυσσε βοὸς πραπίδων ἐῆσι. On this Allen and Sikes write: 'the reeds were cut in different lengths, and fixed in the shell; they thus served as a framework for the ox-hide which was stretched over them, to form a sounding-board.' I see nothing in the mutilated text of Sophocles, which prevents us from supposing that he interpreted Homer in this way; but Robert (p. 557) insists that the fret or bridge (cf. fr. 36 n.), the yoke, and the πῆχει were all denominated δόνακες, and that the ox-hide was especially employed 'to cover the ends of the bridge so as to keep it fast and prevent displacement.' Schenkl, who lays stress on the interpretation of κόλλωψ in Eustath. Od. p. 1915, 7, holds that fresh ox-hide was wrapped round the lower fret chiefly to prevent drying and cracking, and that this process was described in 312 f.—δέρμα καὶ στέγος φέρει, Viljoen. Wilamowitz suggests κώστρακον to follow δέρμα.

308 κλαγγάνει: cf. fr. 959.

309 Schenkl completes the line by adapting the corrupt fr. 315 so as to run: ἐνὶ ἡλάτῃ ξύλ' ὥς τρίγωνα διατόρως ἐρείδετα. This is very ingenious, and he is entitled to appeal to the aptness of the comparison between the structure of the lyre and the framework of a bed. But, even after the necessary changes introduced by Schenkl, the words do not seem to cohere with the previous line.

25	[24 litt.	κοι]λάδος κ[
		21 „	κόλ]λοπες δε[
		24 „]αμματω[ 25 „]ον[

desunt versus unus vel duo

Col. xiii καὶ τοῦτο λύπη[ς] ἔστ' ἄκεστρον καὶ παραψυκ[τ]ή-ρ[ι]ον

κείνω μόνον, χα[ί]ρει δ' ἀλύων καὶ τι προσφών[ων] μέλος

ξύμφωνον· ἔξα[ί]ρει γὰρ αὐτὸν αἰόλισμα τῆς λ[ύ]ρας.
οὕτως ὁ παῖς θανόντι θηρὶ φθέγμ' ἐμηχανήσατ[ο. 320

5 XO. ὁ < ρθο > ψάλακτός τις ὁμφὰ κατοικχνεῖ τόπον, (στρ.)

311 κοιλάδος supplevit Mekler 313 ο supra primum a add. pap.² 318 ἀλυίων
pap. 321 ὀρθοψάλακτος Murray: αψάλακτος pap., ἀπροψάλακτος Wilamowitz | ὁμφή pap.

311 κοιλάδος was restored by Mekler, as the tortoise-shell sounding-board (ήχειον). He cited Bekk. anecd. p. 752, 11 Ἑρμῆς ἐν Ἀρκαδίᾳ ἀναστρεφόμενος εὖρε χελώνην καὶ διακόψας ἐποίησε κοιλίαν λύρας. Gemoll on h. Herm. 416. This seems better than Schenkl's κέαλας.

312 κόλλοις were the pegs by means of which the strings were fastened to the ζυγόν. Cf. Hom. φ 407 ῥηιδίως ἐτάνωσσε νέω περὶ κόλλασι χορδήν.

313 See cr. n. Schenkl suggests καθαμμάτων from Poll. 4. 60.

317f. For the general sense cf. Shakesp. Henry VIII iii. 1. 12 In sweet music is such art, | killing care and grief of heart | fall asleep, or, hearing, die.—ἄκεστρον: fr. 480.—παραψυκτήριον is a word hitherto unrecorded.—ἀλύων. The unfamiliar sound is regarded as a sign of distraction. For the fact see h. Herm. 53 πλήκτρῳ ἐπειρήτιζε κατὰ μέρος, ἢ δ' ὑπὸ χειρὸς σμερδαλέον κονάβησε· θεὸς δ' ὑπὸ καλὸν αἰδεῖν | ἐξ αὐτοσχέδης πειρώμενος. Observe that μόνον, 'he has nothing else to comfort him,' prepares the way for ἀλύων ('he is crazy with delight'), which in its turn is justified by ἔξαίρει. Cf. Bekk. anecd. p. 380, 20, giving ἐπαίρεσθαι καὶ χαιρεῖν as a gloss on Hom. σ 333. There is thus no need for Bucher's ἀθύρων.

319 ἔξαιρει, elates. Cf. El. 1460 εἰ τις αὐτῶν ἐπ' αἰὶν κενὰς παρὸς | ἐξήρει' ἀνδρὸς τοῦδε. But a still closer parallel is to be found in Eur. Alc. 346 οὐτ' αὖ

φρέν' ἐξαιροῖμι πρὸς Αἴβυν λακεῖν | αὐλόν. —αἰόλισμα τῆς λύρας, 'the lyre's varied notes' rather than 'the cunning device of the lyre' (Hunt). Cf. Eur. Ion 498 συνίγων ὑπ' αἰόλας λαχὰς θνῦνων. Carm. pop. 8 (PLG p. 657) ἀπλοῦν ῥυθμὸν χέοντες αἰδῶν μέλει. Oppian Hal. 728 ἀηδόνος αἰδοφώνου. For the description as especially suitable to the lyre see Pind. Ol. 3. 8 φόρμιγγά τε ποικιλόγαρον. 4. 2 ὑπὸ ποικιλόφρμιγγος αἰδῶς. Nem. 4. 14 ποικίλον κιθαρίζων. Plat. legg. 812 D τὴν δ' ἑτεροφωνίαν καὶ ποικιλίαν τῆς λύρας.

321 The short ode which begins here corresponds metrically to 362 ff. The metre is similar to 237 ff.—ὀρθοψάλακτος, 'loud': cf. 249. οψάλακτος (see cr. n.) is meaningless, and 362 indicates that one extra syllable is required, so that I follow Hunt in adopting Murray's conjecture, but without much confidence that it is right. Wilamowitz does not explain his ἀπροψάλακτος, which, though presumably based on προψάλασσω (241), is by no means perspicuous. Since ψαλάσσω was unquestionably used for twanging the lyre (Lycophr. 139 τοίγαρ ψαλάξεις εἰς κενὸν νευρὰς κτύπον, | αἶσα κάδωρητα φορμύζων μέλη), this meaning must surely have been the chief element in the compound (perhaps ἀποψάλακτος after Philostr. vit. soph. 2. 1. 14 ἢ γλῶττα τὴν ἄκραν Ἀθιδά ἀποψάλλει).—κατοικχνεῖ τόπον. The genitive resembles πεδίον ἐπινύσσεται O.C. 689. It is descended from the old (partitive) genitive

10

πρεπτά <δ' αὖ> διὰ τόνου φάσματ' ἔγχωρ' ἐπανθεμίζει.

τὸ πρᾶγμα δ' οἶπερ πορεύω βάδην,

ἴσθι τὸν δα[ί]μον' ὅστις ποθ' ὅς 325

ταύτ' ἐτεχνήσατ', οὐκ ἄλλος ἐστὶν κλ[ο]πεὺς ἀντ' ἐκείνου, γύναι, σάφ' ἴσθι.

σὺ δ' ἀντὶ τῶνδε μὴ χαλε-φθῆς ἐμοὶ <μη> δὲ δυσφορηθῆς.

322 πρεπτά δ' αὖ Hunt: πρεπτά (sic) pap., sed pr reformavit pap.² 323 ἐπανθεμίζεται legisse Theonem in marg. testatur pap.² 324 οἶπερ coni. Hunt: οἶπερ pap. sed litteram u seclisuit pap.² 329 ἐμοὶ μηδὲ coni. Hunt: ἐμοὶ δε pap., μηδὲ
Wilamowitz

of place which survives in the Homeric διώκεσθαι πεδίοιοι. But in both cases the preposition assists the construction: see Kuehner-Gerth I 404.

322 f. See cr. nn. πρεπτά in agreement with φάσματα is supported by Hesych. III p. 369 πρεπτά φαντάσματα, εἰκόνες, which, as Wilamowitz suggests,
may relate to this particular passage.
Hunt gives two versions: (1) 'the song plucks local images.' Or (2) with ἐπανθεμίζει intransitive: 'fantasies flit over the scene,' like a bird or bee from flower to flower. I prefer the latter alternative and take Theon's variant, which is against the metre, to be an acknowledgment of the intransitive use of ἐπανθεμίζει. But I should prefer to render: 'visions revealed by the straining chords are spread around us (ἐγχοῦρα, predicative) like a carpet of flowers.'
Similarly in Aesch. Cho. 150, where ἐπανθίζειν 'to make to blossom' is transsitive, there is the same comparison of sound to flowers. The variegated ποικιλία of the lyre (319) is expressed as ἀνθεμα.
For the τόπος of the lyre (ἐπτάτονος) cf.
Ar. Eq. 532. Stahl, who thinks that ἐπανθεμίζει must be transitive, makes ὁμφά
the subject, and reads ἐγχοῦρα for ἐγχοῦρα.

324 ff. On the assumption that the text is sound in the main, the baldness of style and clumsiness of structure are quite unlike Sophocles. Wilamowitz gives up the first line as corrupt, and holds that the sense required is τὸ πρᾶγμα δ' μετέρχομαι. Translate rather: 'this is the point to which I am gradually conducting my search (τὸ πρᾶγμα = τὸ χρῆμα in 223): whoever be the god who devised this trick, the thief is none other than he, lady, you may be sure.'
(1) οἶπερ seems indispensable here, as in

Eur. Hel. 1670, since οἶπερ would be scarcely intelligible. Where the verb is in the perfect tense, as in Trach. 40, the case may be different. (2) I understand οἶπερ as having a personal reference, i.e.
to τὸν δαίμον' in the following clause. See on fr. 191 and cf. Hdt. 9. 1 ὅκου δὲ ἐκάστοτε γένοιτο, τοῦτους παρελάμβανε, Phil.
456 ff., and for the relative clause put first Kuehner-Gerth II 420 Anm. 2. The extraordinary circumlocutions are due to the chorus being afraid to come to the point (cf. 328 f.). (3) τὸν δαίμον' is an anticipated accusative, but instead of being resumed as the subject (or object) of a subordinate clause, ἐκείνου takes its place.
So El. 1366. For a similar looseness of connexion see on Eur. Phoen. 101. (4) Instead of the subordinate clause for which we are looking, there follows what now becomes the main sentence, as if ἴσθι which precedes were as much parenthetic as σάφ' ἴσθι which follows (O.T. 1022, 1117, fr. 282 n.). (5) ὅστις ποθ' ὅς is strangely substituted for ὅστις ποτ' ἦν ὅς, which is itself an unusual amplification of ὅστις. In O.T. 1349 ὅλοι' ὅστις ἦν ὅς κτέ.
Hermann cut out ἦν. O.T. 373 οὐδεὶς ὅς οὐχὶ κτέ.—ἄλλος...δὲν' ἐκείνου: for the pleonasm see on Eur. Hel. 574, Starkie on Ar. Nub. 653.

For Hermes in the character of a thief
cf. Cornut. 16 p. 25, 13 Lang κλέπτην αὐτὸν παρέδωκαν. The evidence is collected by Gruppe, Gr. Myth. p. 1338, and by Eitrem in Pauly-Wissowa VIII 780.

Stahl, reading οὐ περί προνεῶα, with ὡς for ὅς and τοῦτ' for ταῦτ', makes τὸ πρᾶγμα the anticipated object of ἐτεχ-νήσατο, with ὡς following ἴσθι.

329 See cr. n. Wilamowitz thinks that this and the preceding line are not part of the strophe, but form a tetrameter

- KT. [τίς ἔχει πλά]νη σε; τίνα κλοπὴν ἀνείδισ[ας; 330
 15 XO. [οὐ μὰ Δία σ', ὃ πρέσ]βειρα, χειμάζειν [θέλω.
 KT. [τὸν δ' ἐκ Διὸς βλαστό]ντα φηλήτην καλ[εῖς;
 XO. [.....] ἂν αὐτῇ τῇ κλο[πῇ].
 KT. [.....] εἴ γε τὰ [λ]ηθῇ λέ[γεις].
 XO. [.....] τ[ἀληθῇ] λέγ[ω]. 335
 20 [.....] κεκλο[φέναι] σαφ[.....]
 [.....] δὲ βοῦς πάνν
 [.....] α καθήρ[μ]ο[σε]
 [.....] λου τεμών [.....]
 [.....] φο . δ[ο]ρᾷ 340
 desunt versus duo vel tres
 Col. xiv KT. [.....] ἄρτι μανθάνω χρόνῳ
 [.....] ἔγχ[ασκοντα] τῇ 'μῇ μωρία
 [.....] οὐδέν, ἀλλὰ παιδιᾶς χάριω. 345
 5 [σὺ δ' οὖν τὸ λοιπὸ]ν εἰς ἔμ' εὐδιαν ἔχων, [εἴ σοι φέρει χάρ]μ' ἢ τι κερδαίνειν δοκεῖς, [ὅπως θέλεις κά]χαζε καὶ τέρπου φρένα·

332 supplavit Mekler | φηλήτην pap.

non liquet

340 δορᾷ pap.: corr. Robert

336 quatenus processerit stichomythia

catalectic closing the preceding catalectic series. The text is unfortunately defective at 369, where it might have decided the question.—δυσφορηθῆς implies δυσφορεῖσθαι, of which there is no trace except as a variant in Xen. Cyr. 2. 2. 5. For the passive form of the aorist see on frs. 164, 837.

331 χειμάζειν, to annoy, vex, distress, —in a less severe sense than in 167 (n.). The use seems to have been colloquial (cf. Ant. 391), and is glossed with ἐνοχλεῖν by Ammon. p. 146, quoting Menander ἐν Ἡρόκλῳ (fr. 208, III 60 K.). Cf. fr. 404, 6 (III 117 K.) ἀλλ' ἐν ἀκαλύπτῳ καὶ ταλαιπώρῳ βίῳ | χειμαζόμενος ζῇ. fr. 970 (III 248 K.). Philem. fr. 28, 10 (II 485 K.).

332 Mekler's supplement is slightly preferable to Hunt's μὴν τὸν Διὸς παῖδ' ὄντα.—φηλήτην: see cr. n. and fr. 933 n. Maas (B. ph. 1912, 1076) reverts to the form φηλήτης, on the ground that it is also supported by the wooden tablet of the Hecale, and by the papyrus of Hellanicus (Ox. Pap. 1084. 3). It is certainly remarkable that the text of Hellanicus by affirming the derivation from φιλῆν seems to indicate that he employed φιλῆτης, but we cannot feel certain that the statement really goes back to the supposed original. For a similar error see 358 and fr. 171 (φιλαφᾶ for ψηλαφᾶ). The word was particularly associated with Hermes from the Homeric hymn (292, 446) onwards. Besides Hellanicus, see Eur. Rhes. 217 Ἑρμῆς, ὅς γε φηλήτων ἀναξ. CIG 2299 (Kaibel, ep. 1188) Ἑρμῆν τὸν κλέπτην τίς ὑφέλλετο; θεμῖος δ' κλέπτης | ὅς τῶν φηλήτων ὥχετ' ἀνακτα φέρων.

333 κλοπῇ. Hunt thinks this is concrete as in Eur. Hel. 1675 (= thing stolen), and suggests ὅν γ' ἐντυχῶν λάβοιμ' αὖν. But we might as well have καὶ γὰρ δοκεῖ λαθεῖν αὖν—for all his thievery (cf. 162). For the metre see p. 230.

344 ε. The gaps are well filled by Mekler with πονηρῆ σ' ἐχάσκοντα and δρᾶς δ' ὀγιεῖ οὐδέν. He supposes that a new sentence begins with ἀρτι in 343.

346 εἰς ἣν εὐδιαν ἔχων: at your ease so far as I am concerned, i.e. I shan't interfere with you. Cf. Protag. fr. 9 (Diels, Vorsokr. 2 p. 540, 3) εὐδίας γὰρ εἴχετο = 'he remained undisturbed.' For εἰς cf. O.C. 1121 τῆνδε τὴν ἐς τὰςδε μοι | τέρψιν. Jebb on O.T. 706.

348 κάχαζε: Al. 199.

- 10 [τὸν παῖδα δ' ὅ]ντα τοῦ Διὸς σαφέϊ λόγῳ
[μὴ βλάπτε κιν]ῶν ἐν νέῳ νέον λόγον. 350
[οὗτος γὰρ οὔτε] πρὸς πατρός κλέπτῃς ἔφν
[οὐτ' ἐγγενὲς μ]ήτρῳσιν ἢ κλοπῇ κρατεῖ.
[σὺ δ' ἄλλοσ' εἰ τ]ις ἐστι, τὸν κλέπτην σκόπει
[καὶ γῆν ἄ]καρπον· τοῦδε δ', οὐ πλανᾷ δόμους, [αἶν]ει γένος, πρόσαπτε τὴν πονηρίαν 355
[πρὸς] ὄντων ἦκει· τῷδε δ' οὐχ οὕτω πρέπει.
15 [ἀλλ'] αἶεν εἰ σὺ παῖς· νέος γὰρ ὦν ἀνὴρ

350 supplevi 352 sqq. initia supplevi 354 δ' οὐ πλανᾷ δόμους scripsi: τουπαται δόμος pap., δ supra τ et spiritum asperum supra ου add. pap.², δ' οὐ πεινῇ δόμος Wilamowitz 355 ἀθρεῖ Wilamowitz 356 δ' ex τ' corr. pap.² 357 εἰσι pap.

350 μὴ βλάπτε κινῶν. I have preferred this to Hunt's μὴ σκῶπτε ποιῶν, because to accuse a god of theft is fitly described as an injurious slander, and κινῶν is somewhat more apt (see Blaydes on Ar. Nub. 1397) than ποιῶν. 'Stirring up a new charge against a new-born child.' Note the careless repetition of λόγον in a somewhat different sense, and see Jebb on O.C. 554. For ἐν (= in relation to) cf. Ani. 551 ἐν σοὶ γελῶ. Ai. 1092 μὴ...ἐν θανούσιν ἔβροστῆς γένν. ib. 1315 ἐν ἐμοὶ θρασύς. Eur. Med. 206 τὸν ἐν λέχει προδόταν.

351 πρὸς πατρός. So πρὸς αἵματος El. 1125, Ai. 1305.

352 ἐγγενὲς follows El. 1328. Wilamowitz supplied οὐτ' αὖτις ἐν.—κρατεῖ: prevails, i.e. maintains itself. Cf. Thuc. 1. 71 ἀνάγκη δὲ ὥσπερ τέχνης αἰετὰ ἐπιγιγνώμενα κρατεῖν.

353 Hunt's εἰ δὴ κλοπῇ τίς ἐστι leaves the sentence incomplete. ἄλλοσε was suggested by El. 1474 μηκέτ' ἄλλοσε σκόπει.

354 καὶ γῆν ἄκαρπον: or perhaps ἄγρον τ' ἄκαρπον. Hunt reads ἄπορον ἄκαρπον, but ἄκαρπον can scarcely be the epithet of a person, and the grammatical relation of the adjectives is obscure.—τοῦδε κτέ.: see cr. n. If the disappearance of A before A was due to haplography, the reading given in the text is closer to the original than the conjecture of Wilamowitz, which Hunt adopts. The rough breathing (σδ) may, of course, have been an error, but that is less likely to have occurred in a text where smooth breathings are not recorded. Lastly, γένος, whether preceded by ἀθρεῖ or by αἶνει, is undoubtedly clearer if combined with τοῦδε than if isolated. On the other hand,

Philostr. imag. 1 25. 1 οὐ τι πω ταῦτα πενία δρών ὁ θεός may be quoted in favour of πεινῇ.

355 αἶνει; see cr. n. I formerly suggested ὀκνεῖ, but αἶνει 'respect' is much better, and may be recommended independently of the reading adopted in the last line. Cf. Eur. fr. 395 τὴν μὲν γὰρ εὐγένειαν αἰνοῦσιν βροτοί. Theodect. fr. 15 (Nauck, p. 806) ἐγὼ μὲν οὐκ οὐτ' εὐγένειαν ἤνεσα. Aesch. fr. 300 γένος μὲν αἰνεῖν ἐκμαθὼν ἐπίσταμαι | Ἀλθιοπίδος γῆς.

356 ἦκει (= προσῆκει), comes fittingly, as in O.C. 738 σῖνεχ' ἦκέ μοι γένει | τὰ τοῦδε πυνθεῖν πῆμαρ' ἐς πλείστον πόλεως, where, as Ellendt has pointed out, the passages usually quoted in illustration are not really parallel. In Ar. Plut. 919 (quoted by Hunt) ἦκει = 'devolves upon.'—πρέπει: sc. προσάπειν τὴν πονηρίαν.

357 f. The connexion of thought appears to be as follows. 'But, instead of bidding you to desist, I ought to remember that this ridiculous charge is characteristic of you. You never cease your childish ways: though a full-grown man' (so venarian in fr. 210, 73) 'with a thick beard' (i.e. no longer μειράκιον or ἀγέλειος) 'you are as wanton as a goat surfeited with thistles.' Wilamowitz, reading κνηῶ, understands 'you swagger with your yellow goat-beard'; but the simile is exactly on a line with fr. 848 σὺ δὲ σφαδάζεις πῶλος ὥς εὐφορβίᾳ, and the comparison of wanton conduct to the skittishness of an overfed animal was evidently familiar. Cf. Ar. Vesp. 1305 ἀνῆλλετ', ἐσκίρτα, πεπόρδει κάγελα | ὥσπερ καυχρῶν ὀνίδιον εὐωχημένον. Theogn. 1249 παῖ, σὺ μὲν αὖτως ἵππος, ἐπεὶ κριθῶν ἐκαρέσθης, | αὖθις ἐπὶ σταθμῶς

π[ώγ]ωνι θάλλων ὡς τράγος κνήκῃ χλιδᾷς.
παύου τὸ λείον φαλακρὸν ἡδονῇ πιτνάς.

[ο]ὐκ ἐκ θεῶν τὰ μωρὰ καὶ γέλοια χρῇ 360
[χ]ανόντα κλαίειν ὕστερ', ὡς <σ'> ἐγὼ γελῶ;

20 XO. στρέφου λυγίζου τε μύθοις, ὅποι- (ἀντιστρ.)
αν θέλεις βάξιν εὕρισκ' ἀπό.

ψηκτον· οὐ γάρ με ταῦτα πείσεις <ὁ> πῶς τὸ χρῆμ' οὗτος εἰργασμένος 365

ῥινοκόλλητον ἄλλων ἔκλεψεν βοῶν

25 που δορά[ς ἢ] 'πὸ τῶν Λοξίου.

μή με τὰ[σδ'] ἐξ ὁδοῦ βίβαζε.

desunt versus fere quattuor

358 κνίκῃ pap. 360 εἰς θεῶν Wilamowitz | λοία χρῇ in ras. pap.² 361 ὕστερ-ρωιτεγῶν pap., τ supra prius γ et ὑστερῶσιν in marg. add. pap.², ὕστερ'; ὡς ἐγὼ λέγω Hunt, ὑστερῶς, ἐγὼ λέγω Wilamowitz 362 sq. μύθοις | ὅποιαν pap.
363 θέλεις ex θέλεις corr. pap.² 365 ὅπως Wilamowitz et Murray: πῶς
pap | χρῆμα οὗτος legisse Theonem testatur pap.²: χρηματοῦτες pap.

ἡλυθες ἡμετέρους. The correction εἰ σὺ seems inevitable; but Wilamowitz, who insists that Silenus is still on the stage and must be the person addressed, makes the violent alteration of νέος to πάλαι. Hunt has shown that the young satyrs are often represented as bald-headed and that the taunt may be quite well addressed to the chorus. Cf. Eur. Cycl. 434 νεανίας γάρ εἰ.

359 Hunt renders 'cease courting pleasure with your bald pate,' but does not explain the peculiarity of the language. No satisfactory result can be deduced from the interpretation of πιτνάς either as spreading or strewing (Hes. Scut. 291). It is suggested, therefore, that πιτνημι is used here in the figurative sense of to flatter or excite, a meaning which is perhaps justified by Hom. σ 160 ὅπως πετάσειε μάλιστα | θυμὸν μνηστήρων, and by φρένας ἐκπεπτασμένους if that is read ib. 327.

360 f. See cr. n. 'Take care that the gods don't punish your foolish jests, and give me cause to laugh at the tears that will follow.' The order of the words shows that considerable stress is laid on ἐκ θεῶν, for which see n. on fr. 326. The final clause ὡς ἐγὼ γελῶ ironically represents the natural result of an action as the purpose of the agent. Cf. e.g. Hom. B 359, ἀπτέσθω ἥς νηὶς...δφρα πρόσθ' ἄλλων θάνατον καὶ πότμον ἐπίσπῃ. The addition of σ' improves the antithesis, and is scarcely a ponderable alteration. Hunt, putting a question after ὕστερ', reads ὡς ἐγὼ λέγω, and suggests that σ' should be added after κλαίειν. Wilamowitz alters ἐκ θεῶν to εἰς θεούς, and ends the sentence with ὑστερῶς, ἐγὼ λέγω (coll. Eur. fr. 499). For the adverbial acc. ὕστερα see Kuehner-Gerth I 310.

362 στρέφου, shuffle, recalls Ar. Ach. 385 (Starkie's n.).

363 f. ἀπούληκτον: wiped clean, and so, keen-scented, sharp, acute. The best illustration of the metaphor is Hor. Sat. 1. 4. 8 emunctae naribus (of Lucilius). Cf. Lucian navis. 45 καίτοι ἐνὸς τοῦ ἀναγκαϊοτάτου προσδεῖ, δς περιθέμενόν σε παύσει μωραίνοντα, τὴν πολλὴν ταύτην κόρυζαν ἀποξέσας. Plat. rep. 343 A κορυζῶντα περιορά καὶ οὐκ ἀπομύττει δέμενον. Hunt, however, prefers to understand the word, which does not occur elsewhere, as equivalent to 'well-groomed,' i.e. elaborate; and Wilamowitz gives it an active sense—removing suspicion, exculpatory.—For the redundancy of ταῦτα cf. O.T. 1058 οὐκ ἂν γένοιτο τοῦθ', ὅπως ἐγὼ...οὐ φανῶ τοῦμὸν γένος.

365 f. τὸ χρῆμα: cf. 136.—ῥινοκόλλητον is not complementary to the verb (proleptic), but is employed in accordance with the common Greek idiom, which used to be known as the tertiary predicate. Translate: 'now, since the thing that he made was of glued hides, he could

Col. xv

- XO. [ό Ζ]εὺς γὰρ [
 KT. [ό] παῖς κλο[π
 XO. [ει] τοι πονη[ρὰ δρᾶ, πονηρὸς ὦν κυρεῖ. 375
 KT. [κ]ακῶς ἀκού[ειν οὐ πρέπει Διὸς γόνυ.
 5 XO. [ε]ἰ δ' ἔστ' ἄλλη[θῇ, χρή με καὶ λέγειν τάδε.
 KT. [ο]ὐ μὴ τὰδ' [εἰπῆς

 KT. [ XO. [
 KT. τ[
 10 XO. ι[
 KT. υ[
 XO. [
 KT. λ[385
 XO. γ. [. . . .]α. . . [
 15 KT. πο[ύ] καὶ βόας νέμονται τ[
 XO. π[λ]είους δέ γ' ἤδη νῦν [
 KT. τίς, ὦ πονήρ', ἔχει; τί πλ[
 XO. ὁ παῖς ὃς ἔνδον ἐστὶν ἐγκεκλη[μένος. 390
 KT. [τὸ]ν παῖδα παῦσαι τοῦ Διὸς [κακῶς λέγων.
 20 XO. π[α]ύοιμ' [ᾶ]ν [εἰ] τὰς βοῦς τις ε[
 KT. ἤδη με πν[ί]γεις καὶ σὺ χα[ί] βόες σέθεν.

390 δs Wilamowitz et Murray: τοδ pap., δδ' pap.² | ἐστὶν supplevit pap.² 391 ou supra παῦσαι (i.e. παῦον) add. pap.² | τὸν Διὸς Wilamowitz 392 δ in marg. quadringentesimo versui adscriptum 393 πνέ[ι]. γεις pap.

not have stolen them from any other cattle than Apollo's. Don't try to turn me from this track.'—ἦ 'πὸ. For the preposition accompanying the second noun only cf. Eur. Hel. 863 Τροίας δὲ σωθεῖς κατὸ βαρβάρου χθονός, and see on fr. 20.—ἔδοῦ: the metaphor of the trail is renewed from 324.

375 If the sense is correctly restored, it may be illustrated by Eur. fr. 336 ὁ μὲν γὰρ ἐσθλὸς εὐγενὴς ἐμογ' ἀνὴρ κτέ. Astyd. fr. 8 (Nauck, p. 780) γένους δ' ἐπαινὸς ἐστὶν ἀσφαλέστατος | κατ' ἀνδρ' ἐπαινεῖν ὅστις ἂν δίκαιος ᾖ | τρόπους τ' ἀριστος, τοῦτον εὐγενῇ καλεῖν.

389 Rossbach completes the line with τί πλεονας λέγεις; Mekler suggested τί πλαγιάζεις πάλιν ('what new trick is this?').

391 See cr. n. τὸν Διὸς, proposed by Wilamowitz, would be in accordance with the general rule, if it is desired to lay the chief stress on the genitive. But there are many examples where the attributive genitive follows the governing noun without a repetition of its article. See Kuehner-Gerth I § 464, Anm. 1.

392 Wilamowitz completed the line with ἐξελάν θέλοι, which is adopted by Hunt. But παύοιμ' ἄν cannot be intransitive (Eur. Hel. 1319 n.). We might of course read (e.g., λώβης σε χρὴ in 391), and take παῦσαι as aor. inf. act. But the variant παῦον shows that παῦσαι was regarded as an imperative, so that this expedient is improbable. Probably then we should supply εἰ τις ἐξάγοι, στόμα (or λόγων) or the like. Anyhow ἐξελάν as present infinitive is better avoided.

393 is an echo of Ant. 573 ἄγαν γε λυπεῖς καὶ σὺ καὶ τὸ σὸν λέχως, with the comic tone indicated by the use of πνίγεις.

	XO.	[. . .]λεισεπρ[. . .]υ[. ε]ξελαυν[desunt versus fere undeviginti
Col. xvi	πελέθοις βοῶν [414
		desunt versus fere duodecim
Col. xvii	.	.	.
		[[[[
5	XO.	ἰοὺ ἰοὺ [ἦν τ' ἔφη π[οὔτος οὐ φ[430
	ΣΙ.	ὦ Λ[οξία ἰὼ δ[435
10	XO.	ὦ Λοξία δε[καὶ παρη[τῶν [β]οῶ[ν
	ΑΠ.	[.]νν[.] ε[.]ει[440
15		βο[όπο[πρ[μισθὸς [ἐλεύθερο[445
20	ΣΙ.	τὸν ἐγ[

394 ἀπολεῖ σε coni. Murray 414 columna omnino periit, nisi quod verba πελέθοις βοῶν Theonem legisse in marg. testatur pap.² 431 post ἰοὺ ἰοὺ litterae π[.]γ. deletae sunt 432 τ ex δ corr. pap.²

For this word see Blaydes on Ar. Nub. 1036, who shows that it is commonly used in the New Comedy as well as in Lucian. L. and S.'s account is incomplete.—For the contemptuous pronoun (χαῖ βόες σέθεν) see on fr. 165.

394 Murray's ἀπολεῖ σε is plausible, but it is difficult to complete the line, unless the speech of the chorus extended beyond a single verse.

414 For the palaeographical data bearing on the position of this column see Hunt's note.

431α. The remains of Col. xvii appear to belong to a scene in which Apollo had returned to the stage, and had learnt from the chorus of the success of their search. Consequently he tells them that they have earned their rewards. Probably Silenus also reappeared at this point, whereas Cyllene had retired discomfited. We might suggest that the suspicions of the chorus had been confirmed by some visual evidence, which prepared the way for their triumph. Hunt concludes that a single column has been lost between 394 and 431, and so much space at least seems to be required.

445 ἐλεύθεροι δ' ἔσεσθε τὸν πάντα χρόνον (Rossbach), but λοιπόν should at any rate be substituted for the unmetrical πάντα.

315

ἐνήλατα ξύλα

τρίγομφα διατορεύσαι σε δείται

315 Pollux 10. 34 μέρη δὲ κλίνης ἐνήλατα καὶ ἐπικλιντρον, τὸ μὲν γε ἐπικλιντρον ὑπὸ Ἀριστοφάνους (fr. 44, 1 403 K.) εἰρημένον Σοφοκλῆς δ' ἐν Ἰχθυεῦταις σατύροις ἔφη 'ἐνήλατα...δεῖται.'

Rutherford (New Phryn. p. 267) pronounces these words to be 'too corrupt to convey any meaning.' The conjectures hitherto recorded assume that the sense required is 'the posts must be pierced with nails.' Thus Pauw (after Hemsterhuis) conjectured τριγόμεφους διατορεύσαι δεῖ, and Valckenaer on Phoen. 1186 (1179) ἐνήλατα τρίγομφα διατορεύσαι σε δεῖ, omitting ξύλα. Lobeck (Phryn. p. 178) gave as alternatives ἐνήλατα ξύλ<ουργέ> γόμεφους διατορεύσαι σε δεῖ, and ἐνήλατα ξύγγομφα διατορεύσαι σε δεῖ, with the obscure comment 'spondas prius ad eum finem perforatas συγγομῶσαι.' But none of these suggestions is satisfactory. ἐνήλατα are the four posts or bars—'bed-rails'—which, when jointed together, form the framework of the κλίνη; they are supported by the feet, which are screwed into them. Cf. Hesych. I p. 193 ἐρμῖνα' πῶδα κλίνης ἀπὸ τοῦ ἐνείρεσθαι τῷ ἐνήλάτῳ. Phrynichus (CLV R.) states that κραστήρια is the correct Attic term for ἐνήλατα, but there is no material to test his authority. The meaning is placed beyond doubt by Artemid. oneirocr. I. 74, quoted by Mau in Pauly-Wissowa III 370. The interpretation of τρίγομφα and διατορεύσαι is doubtful; but I think it is possible to get nearer to the truth. (1) The sense usually given to τρίγομφα, 'fastened with three nails,' is absurd. I should rather suppose that it means 'firmly-bolted,' and that τρι- has the same force as in τριγέρων, τρίδουλος, τριτάλαι, τριπανούργος, τρισάβλιος and many others. (2) διατορεύσαι is not to bore through, but to engrave, chase; and, although it may be an error for διατορῆσαι or διατορεῖν σε, the corruption is not likely. On the other hand, the context does not suggest an allusion to τορευτική; for, although the bedstead of Odysseus was adorned with gold, silver and ivory (Hom. ψ 200), the verb required here must have been appropriate to ξύλα. But τορεύειν and its cognates are constantly confused with ταρρεύειν etc.; and διατορρεύειν, to finish off with the lathe, is exactly what we want (Hom. Γ 391). I suggest, therefore, that we should read something like ξύλα | ἐνήλατων τρίγομφα διατορρεύσεως | δέται, or perhaps simply διατορρεύσεται. In Aelian var. hist. 14. 7 perhaps διατορρευθέντες would be an improvement for διατορρευθέντες (cf. ἀποτορρεύω). I find that Blaydes has suggested ἐνήλατ' οὖν τρίγομφα τορρεύσαι σε δεῖ, besides alternatives; and Herwerden ἐνήλατα | <κλινῶν> τρίγομφα <πολλά> τορρεύσαι σε δεῖ. R. Ellis conjectured διατόρευν' ἀποξῆσαι σε δεῖ. It should be added that Robert guesses that Hermes had concealed the lyre in his mother's bed, and that we should read δεῖ τρίγομφ' ἐνήλατα | <νῦν> διατορεύσαι (? διατορῆσαι) σ'. Even if the facts were as supposed, the method proposed for discovering the lost instrument would be a very strange one. —For Schenkl's view see on fr. 314, 309.

316

ρίκνουσθαι

316 Phot. lex. p. 489, 1 = Suid. s.v. ρικνουσθαι τὸ διέλκεσθαι καὶ παντοδαπῶς διαστρέφειν κατ' εἶδος. λέγεται δὲ καὶ ρικνουσθαι (ρικνουσθαι Phot.) τὸ κάμπτελον γίγνεσθαι ἀσχημόνως καὶ κατὰ συνουσίαν καὶ ὄρχησιν κάμπτοντα τὴν ὁσφύν. Σοφοκλῆς Ἰχθυεῦταις. Cf. Hesych. III p. 429 ρικνουσθαι διέλκεσθαι καὶ παντοδαπῶς διαστρέφειν (διαφέρεσθαι cod.) κατ' εἶδος. p. 431 ρικνουσθαι κινεῖσθαι ἀσχημόνως. Moeris p. 208, 23 ρικνουσθαι τὸ ἀσχημόνως κινεῖσθαι Ἀττικοί. There was also the compound διαρικνουσθαι mentioned by Pollux 4. 99 among a list of dances and defined as τὸ τὴν ὁσφύν φορτικῶς περιάγειν. To the same effect Etym. M. p. 270, 5, who quotes Κράτης (l. Κρατίων) Τροφωνίῳ (fr. 219, 179 K.): ξίφιζε καὶ σπῶδιζε καὶ διαρικνουσθαι. The lemma is not a reference to fr. 314, 295.

317

] βραβευμ[α

317 This scrap is taken from Ox. Pap. IX 1174 fr. 26, and is reproduced here, because βράβευμα, an award, some case of which presumably occurred in the Ichneutae, is a new word.

318

βοῦκλεψ

318 βοῦκλεψ Dindorf: βοοικλεψ A, βοόκλεψ C Eustath., βοίκλεψ Musurus

318 Athen. 409 C τέτριμμαι οἰκότριψ, κέκλεμμαι (C: κέκλαμμαι A) βοῦκλεψ παρὰ Σοφοκλεῖ Ἑρμῆς. Eustath. Od. p. 1401, 15 to the same effect, but without the last three words. Dindorf's conjecture is confirmed by Phryn. praep. soph. p. 17, 16 de B. (= Bekk. anecd. p. 11, 33).

The discovery of the Ichneutae papyrus makes it all but certain that βοῦκλεψ occurred in that play. The fragment was formerly numbered as incertae sedis (932 N.²).

END OF VOLUME I